

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

I saw him look hard at his antagonist.

Give him one on the apron, Fred, and see what happens."

But the driver had already climbed back into his perch, laughing as loudly as any of his companions.

"We'll let you off this time, Harrison," said he. "Are those your sons down there?"

"This is my nephew, master."

"Here's a guinea for him. He shall never say I robbed him of his uncle." And so, having turned the laugh in his favour by his merry way of taking it, he cracked his whip, and away they flew to make London under the five hours, while Jack Harrison, with his half-fullered shoe in his hand, went whistling back to his forge.

CHAPTER II.

THE WALKER OF CLIFFE ROYAL.

So much for Champion Harrison! Now I wish to say something more about Boy Jim, not only because he was the comrade of my youth, but because you will find as you go on that this book is his story rather than mine, and that there came a time when his name and his fame were in the mouths of all England. You will bear with me therefore while I tell you of his character, as it was in those days, and especially of one very singular adventure which neither of us is likely to forget.

It was strange to see Jim with his uncle and his aunt, for he seemed to be of another race and breed from them. Often I have watched them come up the aisle upon a Sunday, first the square, thickset man, and then the little, worn, anxious-eyed woman, and last this glorious lad with his clear-cut face, his black curls and his step so springy and light that it seemed as if he were bound to earth by some lesser tie than the heavy-footed villagers round him. He had not yet attained his full six foot of stature, but no judge of a man (and every woman at least is one) could look at his perfect shoulders, his narrow loins, and his proud head that sat upon his neck like a flower upon its stalk, without feeling that sober joy which all that is beautiful in Nature gives to us—a vague self-content, as though in some way we also had a hand in the making of it.

But we are used to associate beauty with softness in a man. I do not know why they should be so coupled, and they never were with Jim. Of all men that I have known he was the most iron-hard, in body and in mind. Who was there among us who could walk with him, or run with him, or swim with him? Who on all the countryside, save only Boy Jim, would have swung himself over Wolstonbury cliff and clambered down one hundred feet with the mother hawk flapping at his ears in the vain struggle to hold him from her nest? He was but sixteen, with his gristle not yet all set into bone when he fought and beat Gypsy Lee of Burgess Hill, who called himself the cock of the South Downs. It was after this that Champion Harrison took his training as a boxer in hand. "I'd rather you left millin' alone, Boy Jim," said he, "and so had the missus; but if mill you must it will not be my fault if you can not hold up your hands to anything in the south country." And it was not long before he made good his promise.

I have said already that Boy Jim had no love for his books, but by that I meant his school-books, for when it came to the reading of romances or of anything which had a touch of gallantry or adventure, there was no tearing him away from it until it was finished. When such a book came into his hands Friar's Oak and the smithy became a dream to him, and his life was spent out upon the ocean or wandering over the broad continents with his heroes. And he would draw me into his enthusiasm also, so that I was glad to play Friday to his Crusoe when he proclaimed that the Clump at Clayton was a desert island, and that we were cast upon it for a week. But when I found that we were actually to sleep out there without covering every night, and that he proposed that our food should be the sheep of the Downs (wild goats he called them), cooked upon a fire which was to be made by the rubbing together of two sticks, my heart failed me, and on the very first night I crept away to my mother. But Jim staid out there for the whole weary week—a wet week it was, too—and came back at the end of it looking a deal wilder and dirtier than his hero does in the picture books. It is well that he had only promised to stay a week, for if it had been a month, he would have died of cold and hunger before his pride would have let him come home.

His pride—that was the deepest thing in all Jim's nature. It is a mixed quality, to my mind, half a virtue and half a vice—a virtue in holding a man out of the dirt, a vice in making it hard for him to rise when once he has fallen. Jim was proud down to the very marrow of his bones. You remember the guinea that the young lord had thrown him from the box of the coach. Two days later somebody picked it from the roadside mud. Jim only had seen where it had fallen, and he would not deign even to point it out to a beggar. Nor would he stoop to give a reason, in such a case, but would answer all remonstrance with a curl of his lip and a flash of his dark eyes. Even at school he was the same, with such a sense of his own dignity that other folk had to think of it too. He might say, as he did say, that a right angle was a proper sort of an angle, or put Panama in Sicily, but old Joshua Allen would as soon have thought of raising his cane against him as he would of letting me off if I had said as much. And so it was that, although Jim was the son of nobody, and I of a king's officer, it always seemed to me to have been a condescension on his part that he should have chosen me as his friend.

It was this pride of Boy Jim's which led to an adventure which makes me shiver now when I think of it.

It happened in the August of '99, or it may have been in the early days of September, but I remember that we heard the cuckoo in Patcham wood, and that Jim said that perhaps it was the last of him. I was still at school, but Jim had left, he being nigh sixteen and I thirteen. It was my Saturday half-holiday, and we spent it, as we often did, out upon the downs. Our favourite place was beyond Wolstonbury, where we could stretch ourselves upon the soft, springy chalk grass among the plump little southdown sheep, chatting with the shepherds as they leaned upon their queer old Pyecombe crooks, made in the days when Sussex turned out more iron than all the counties of England.

It was there that we lay upon that glorious afternoon. If we chose to roll upon our right side the whole weald would lie in front of us, with the north downs curving away in olive-folds, with here and there the snow-white rift of a chalk pit. If we turned upon our left we overlooked the huge blue stretch of the channel. A convoy, as I can well remember, was coming up it that day, the timid flock of merchantmen in front, the frigates, like well-trained dogs, upon the skirts, and two burly drover line-of-battle ships rolling along behind them. My fancy was soaring out to my father upon the waters, when a word from Jim brought it back on to the grass like a broken-winged gull.

"Roddy," said he, "have you heard that Cliffe Royal is haunted?"

Had I heard it? Of course I had heard it. Who was there in all the Down country who had not heard of the Walker of Cliffe Royal?

"Do you know the story of it, Roddy?"

"Why," said I, with some pride, "I ought to, seeing that my mother's brother, Sir Charles Tregellis, was the nearest friend of Lord Avon, and was down at this card party when the thing happened. I heard the vicar and my mother talking about it last week, and it was all so clear to me that I might have been there when the murder was done."

"It is a strange thing," said Jim, thoughtfully, "but when I asked my aunt about it she would give me no answer, and as to my uncle, he cut me short at the very mention of it."

“There is a good reason for that,” said I, “for Lord Avon was, as I have heard, your uncle’s best friend, and it is but natural that he would not wish to speak of his disgrace.”

“Tell me the story, Roddy.”

“It is an old one now—fourteen years old—and yet they have not got to the end of it. There were four of them who had come down from London to spend a few days in Lord Avon’s old house. One was his own younger brother, Captain Barrington. Another was his cousin, Sir Lothian Hume. Sir Charles Tregellis, my uncle, was the third, and Lord Avon the fourth. They are fond of playing cards for money, these great people, and they played and played for two days and a night. Lord Avon lost and Sir Lothian lost, and my uncle lost, and Captain Barrington won until he could win no more. He won their money, but above all he won the papers from his elder brother, which meant a great deal to him. It was late on a Monday night that they stopped playing. On the Tuesday morning Captain Barrington was found dead beside his bed with his throat cut.”

“And Lord Avon did it?”

“His papers were found burned in the grate, his wristband was clutched in the dead man’s hand, and his knife lay beside the body.”

"Did they hang him then?"

"They were too slow in laying hands upon him. He waited until he saw that they had brought it home to him, and then he fled. He has never been seen since, but it is said that he reached America."

"And the ghost of Captain Barrington walks?"

"So it is said."

"Why is the house still empty?"

"Because it is in the keeping of the law. Lord Avon had no children, and Sir Lothian Hume, he who was at the card party, is his nephew and heir. But he can touch nothing until he can prove Lord Avon to be dead."

Jim lay silent for a bit, plucking at the short grass with his fingers.

"Roddy," said he at last, "will you come with me to-night and look for the ghost?"

It took me aback, the very thought of it.

"My mother would not let me."

"Slip out when she's abed. I'll wait for you at the smithy."

"Cliffe Royal is locked."

"I'll open a window easily enough."

"I'm afraid, Jim."

"But you are not afraid if you are with me, Roddy. I'll promise you that no ghost shall hurt you."

So I gave him my word that I would come, and then all the rest of the day I went about, the most sad-faced lad in Sussex. It was all very well for Boy Jim! It was that pride of his which was taking him there. He would go because there was no one else on the countryside that would dare. But I had no pride of that sort. I was quite of the same way of thinking as the others, and would as soon have thought of passing my night at Jacob's gibbet on Ditchling Common as in the haunted house of Cliffe Royal. Still, I could not bring myself to desert Jim, and so, as I say, I slunk about the house with so pale and peaky a face that my dear mother would have it that I had been at the green apples, and sent me to bed early with a dish of chamomile tea for my supper.

England went to rest betimes in those days, for there were few who could afford the price of candles. When I looked out of my window just after the clock had gone ten there was not a light in the village, save only at the inn. It was but a few feet from the ground, so I slipped out, and there was Jim waiting for me at the smithy corner. We crossed John's Common together, and so past Ridden's farm, meeting only one or two riding officers upon the way. There was a brisk wind blowing, and the moon kept peeping through the rifts of the scud, so that our road was sometimes silver clear and sometimes so black that we found ourselves among the brambles and gorsebushes which lined it. We came at last to the wooden gate with the high stone pillars by the roadside, and looking through between the rails, we saw the long avenue of oaks, and at the end of this ill-boding tunnel the pale face of the house glimmering in the moonshine.

That would have been enough for me, that one glimpse of it, and the sound of the night wind sighing and groaning among the branches. But Jim swung the gate open, and up we went, the gravel squeaking beneath our tread. It towered high, the old house, with many little windows in which the moon glinted, and with a strip of water running round three sides of it. The arched door stood right in the face of us, and on one side a lattice hung open upon its hinge.

"We're in luck, Roddy," whispered Jim. "Here's one of the windows open."

"Don't you think we've gone far enough, Jim?" said I, with my teeth chattering.

"I'll lift you in first."

"No, no ; I'll not go first."

"Then I will." He gripped the sill and had his knees on it in an instant. "Now, Roddy, give me your hands." With a pull he had me up beside him, and a moment later we were both in the haunted house.

How hollow it sounded when we jumped down onto the wooden floor! There was such a sudden boom and reverberation that we both stood silent for a moment. Then Jim burst out laughing.

“What an old drum of a place it is!” he cried. “We’ll strike a light, Roddy, and see where we are.”

He had brought a candle and a tinder box in his pocket. When the flame burned up we saw an arched stone roof above our heads and broad deal shelves all round us, covered with dusty dishes. It was the pantry.

“I’ll show you round,” said Jim, merrily, and, pushing the door open, he led the way into the hall. I remembered the high oak-panelled walls with the heads of deer jutting out and a single white bust, which sent my heart into my mouth, in the corner. Many rooms opened out of this, and we wandered from one to the other—the kitchens, the still room, the morning room, the dining room, all filled with the same choking smell of dust and of mildew.

“This is where they played the cards, Jim,” said I in a hushed voice. “It was on that very table.”

"Why here are the cards themselves," cried he, and he pulled a brown towel from something in the centre of the sideboard. Sure enough it was a pile of playing cards—forty packs, I should think, at the least—which had lain there ever since that tragic game which was played before I was born.

"I wonder whence that stair leads?" said Jim.

"Don't go up there, Jim!" I cried, clutching at his arm. "That must lead to the room of the murder."

"How do you know that?"

"The vicar said that they saw on the ceiling—O Jim, you can see it even now!"

He held up his candle, and there was a great dark smudge which had sopped through the white plaster above us.

"I believe you're right," said he, "but anyhow, I'm going up to have a look at it."

"Don't, Jim, don't!" I cried.

"Tut, Roddy, you can stay here if you are afraid. I won't be more than a minute. There's no use going on a ghost hunt unless—my God! there's something coming down the stairs!"

I heard it, too, a shuffling footstep in the room above, and then a creak from the steps, and then another creak, and another. I saw Jim's face as if it had been carved out of ivory, with his parted lips and his staring eyes fixed upon the black square of the stair opening. He still held the light, but his fingers twitched, and with every twitch the shadows sprang from the walls to the ceiling. As to myself, my knees gave way under me, and I found myself on the floor crouching down behind Jim with a scream frozen in my throat. And still the step came slowly from stair to stair.

Then, hardly daring to look and yet unable to turn away my eyes, I saw a figure dimly outlined in the corner upon which the stair opened. There was a silence in which I could hear my poor heart thumping, and then when I looked again the figure was gone, and the low creak, creak was heard once more upon the stairs. Jim sprang after it, and I was left half fainting in the moonlight.

But it was not for long. He was down again in a minute, and passing his hand under my arm, he half led and half carried me out of the house. It was not until we were in the fresh night air again that he opened his mouth.

“Can you stand, Roddy?”

“Yes, but I’m shaking.”

“So am I,” said he, passing his hand over his forehead. “I ask your pardon, Roddy. I was a fool to bring you on such an errand. But I never believed in such things. I know better now.”

"Could it have been a man, Jim?" I asked, plucking up my courage, now that I could hear the dogs barking on the farms.

"It was a spirit, Roddy."

"How do you know?"

"Because I followed it, and saw it vanish into a wall as easily as an eel into sand. Why, Roddy, what's amiss now?"

My fears were all back upon me, and every nerve creeping with horror. "Take me away, Jim! Take me away!" I cried.

I was glaring down the avenue, and his eyes followed mine. Amid the gloom of the oak trees something was coming toward us.

"Quiet, Roddy!" whispered Jim. "By the Lord, come what may, my arms are going round it this time."

We crouched as motionless as the trunks behind us. Heavy steps ploughed their way through the soft gravel, and a broad figure loomed upon us in the darkness. Jim sprang upon it like a tiger. "You're not a spirit, anyway," he cried.

The man gave a shout of surprise, and then a growl of rage. "What the devil——!" he roared, and then, "I'll break your neck if you don't let go!"

The threat might not have loosened Jim's grip, but the voice did. "Why, uncle!" he cried.

"Well, I'm blessed if it isn't Boy Jim! And what's this? Why, it's young Master Rodney Stone, as I'm a living sinner! What in the world are you two doing up at Cliffe Royal at this time of night?"

We had all moved out into the moonlight, and there was Champion Harrison with a big bundle on his arm, and such a look of amazement upon his face as would have brought a smile back on to mine had my heart not been still cramped with fear.

"We're exploring," said Jim.

"Exploring, are you? Well, I don't think you were meant to be Captain Cooks, either of you, for I never saw such a pair of peeled-turnip faces. Why, Jim, what are you afraid of?"

"I'm not afraid, uncle. I never was afraid. But spirits are new to me, and——"

"Spirits?"

"I've been in Cliffe Royal, and we've seen the ghost."

The champion gave a whistle.

"That's the game, is it?" said he. "Did you have speech with it?"

"It vanished first."

The champion whistled once more. "I've heard there is something of the sort up yonder," said he, "but it's not a thing as I would advise you to meddle with. There's enough trouble with the folks of this world, Boy Jim, without going out of your way to mix up with those of another. As to young Master Rodney Stone, if his good mother saw that white face of his she'd never let him come to the smithy more. Walk slowly on, and I'll see you back to Friar's Oak."

We had gone half a mile perhaps when the champion overtook us, and I could not but observe that the bundle was no longer under his arm. We were nearly at the smithy before Jim asked the question which was already in my mind.

"What took you up to Cliffe Royal, uncle?"

"Well, as a man gets on in years," said the champion, "there's many a duty turns up that the likes of you have no idea of. When you're near forty yourself you'll maybe know the truth of what I say."

So that was all that we could draw from him, but, young as I was, I had heard of coast smuggling and of packages carried to lonely places at night, so that from that time on if I heard that the preventives had made a capture I was never easy until I saw the jolly face of Champion Harrison looking out of his smithy door.

CHAPTER III.

THE PLAY ACTRESS OF ANSTEY CROSS.

I HAVE told you something about Friar's Oak and the life which we led there. Now that my memory goes back to the old place, it would gladly linger, for every thread which I draw from the skein of the past brings out half a dozen others that were entangled with it. I was in two minds when I began whether I had enough in me to make a book of, and now I know that I could write one about Friar's Oak alone, and the folk whom I knew in my childhood. They were hard and uncouth, some of them, I doubt not, and yet, seen through the golden haze of time, they all seem sweet and lovable. There was our good vicar, Mr. Jefferson, who loved the whole world, save only Mr. Slack, the Baptist minister of Clayton; and there was kindly Mr. Slack, who was all men's brother, save only of Mr. Jefferson, the vicar of Friar's Oak. Then there was Monsieur Rudin, the French royalist refugee, who lived over on the Pangdean road, and who, when the news of a victory came in, was convulsed with joy because we had beaten Bonaparte, and shaken with rage because we had beaten the French, so that after the Nile he wept for a whole day out of delight, and then for another one out of fury, alternately clapping his hands and stamping his feet. Well I remember his thin, upright figure and the way in which he jauntily twirled his little cane, for cold and hunger could not cast him down, though we knew that he had his share of both. Yet he was so proud and had such a grand manner of talking that no one dared to offer him a cloak or a meal. I can see his face now, with a flush over each craggy cheek bone when the butcher made him the present of some ribs of beef. He could not but take it, and yet while he was stalking off he threw a proud glance over his shoulder at the butcher, and he said, "Monsieur, I have a dog!" Yet it was Monsieur Rudin and not his dog who looked plumper for a week to come.

Then I remember Mr. Paterson, the farmer, who was what you would now call a radical, though at that time some called him a Priestley-ite, and some a Fox-ite, and nearly everybody a traitor. It certainly seemed to me at the time to be very wicked that a man should look glum when he heard of a British victory, and when they burned his straw image at the gate of his farm, Boy Jim and I were among those who lent a hand. But we were bound to confess he had game, though he might be a traitor, for down he came striding into the midst of us, with his brown coat and his buckled shoes, and the fire beating upon his grim schoolmaster face. My word how he rated us, and how glad we were at last to sneak quietly away! "You livers of a lie," said he. "You and those like you have been preaching peace for nigh two thousand years, and cutting throats the whole time! If the money that is lost in taking French lives were spent in saving English ones, you would have more right to burn candles in your windows. Who are you that dare to come here to insult a law-abiding man?" "We are the people of England," cried young Master Ovington, the son of the Tory squire. "You—you horse-racing, cock-fighting, ne'er-do-weel, do you presume to talk for the people of England? They are a deep, strong, silent stream, and you are the scum, the bubbles, the poor silly froth that floats upon the surface." We thought him very wicked then, but, looking back, I am not sure that we were not very wicked ourselves.

And then there were the smugglers! The Downs swarmed with them, for since there might be no lawful trade between France and England it had all to run in that channel. I have been up on St. John's Common upon a dark night, and, lying among the bracken, I have seen as many as seventy mules and a man at the head of each go flitting past me as silently as fish in a stream. Not one of them but bore its two ankers of the right French cognac, or its bale of silk of Lyons and lace of Valenciennes. I knew Dan Scales, the head of them, and I knew Tom Hislop, the riding officer, and I remember the night they met. "Do you fight, Dan?" asked Tom. "Yes, Tom, thou must fight for it." On which Tom drew his pistol and blew Dan's brains out. "It was a sad thing to do," he said afterward, "but I knew Dan was too good a man, for me, for we tried it out before." It was Tom who paid a poet from Brighton to write the lines for the tombstone, which we all thought were very true and good, beginning—

My word, how he rated us!

Alas! Swift flew the fatal lead
Which pierced the young man's head;
He instant fell, resigned his breath,
And elosed his languid eyes in death.

There was more of it, and I dare say it is all still to be read in Patcham churchyard.

One day about the time of our Cliffe Royal adventure I was seated in the cottage looking round at the curios which my father had fastened on to the walls, and wishing, like the lazy lad that I was, that Mr. Lilly had died before ever he wrote his Latin grammar, when my mother, who was sitting knitting in the window, gave a little cry of surprise.

“Good gracious!” she cried. “What a vulgar-looking woman!”

It was so rare to hear my mother say a hard word against anybody (unless it were General Bonaparte) that I was across the room and at the window in a jump. A pony chaise was coming slowly down the village street, and in it was the queerest-looking person that I had ever seen. She was very stout, with a face that was of so dark a red that it shaded away into purple over the nose and cheeks. She wore a great hat, with a white curling ostrich feather, and from under its brim her two bold black eyes stared out with a look of anger and defiance as if to tell the folk that she thought less of them than they could of her. She had some sort of scarlet pelisse, with white swansdown, about her neck, and she held the reins slack in her hands, while the pony wandered from side to side of the road as the fancy took him. Each time the pony swayed, her head with the great hat swayed also, so that sometimes we saw the crown of it and sometimes the brim.

"What a dreadful sight!" cried my mother.

"What is amiss with her, mother?"

"Heaven forgive me if I misjudge her, Rodney, but I think that the unfortunate woman has been drinking."

"Why," I cried, "she has pulled the chaise up at the smithy. I'll find out all the news for you," and catching up my cap, away I scampered.

Champion Harrison had been shoeing a horse at the forge door, and when I got into the street I could see him with the creature's hoof still under his arm and the rasp in his hand, kneeling down amid the white parings. The woman was beckoning him from the chaise, and he staring at her with the queerest expression on his face. Presently he threw down his rasp and went across to her, standing by the wheel and shaking his head as he talked to her. For my part I slipped into the smithy, where Boy Jim was finishing the shoe, and I watched the neatness of his work and the deft way in which he turned up the calkins. When he had done with it he carried it out, and there was the strange woman still talking with his uncle.

"Is that he?" I heard her ask.

Champion Harrison nodded.

She looked at Jim, and I never saw such eyes in a human head, so large and black and wonderful. Boy as I was, I knew that in spite of that bloated face this woman had once been very beautiful. She put out a hand, with all the fingers going, as if she were playing on the harpsichord, and she touched Jim on the shoulder.

"I hope—I hope you're well," she stammered.

"Very well, mam," said Jim, staring from her to his uncle.

"And happy, too?"

"Yes, mam, I thank you."

"Nothing that you crave for?"

"Why, no, mam, I have all that I lack."

"That will do, Jim," said his uncle in a stern voice. "Blow up the forge again, for that shoe wants reheating."

But it seemed as if the woman had something else that she would say, for she was angry that he should be sent away. Her eyes gleamed and her head tossed while the smith, with his two big hands outspread, seemed to be soothing her as best he could. For a long time they whispered, until at last she seemed to be satisfied.

"To-morrow, then?" she cried out loud.

"To-morrow," he answered.

"You keep your word, and I'll keep mine," said she, and dropped the lash on the pony's back. The smith stood with the rasp in his hand looking after her until she was just a little red spot on the white road. Then he turned, and I never saw his face so grave.

"Jim," said he, "that's Miss Hinton, who has come to live at the Maples out Anstey Cross way. She's taken kind of a fancy to you, Jim, and may be she can help you on a bit. I promised her that you would go over and see her to-morrow."

"I don't want her help, uncle, and I don't want to see her."

"But I've promised, Jim, and you wouldn't make me out a liar. She does but want to talk with you, for it is a lonely life she leads."

"What would she want to talk with such as me about?"

"Why, I can not say that, but she seemed very set upon it, and women have their fancies. There's young Master Stone here, who wouldn't refuse to go and see a good lady, I'll warrant, if he thought he might better his fortune by doing so."

"Well, uncle, I'll go if Roddy Stone will go with me," said Jim.

"Of course he'll go.—Won't you, Master Rodney?"

So it ended in my saying yes, and back I went with all my news to my mother, who dearly loved a little bit of gossip. She shook her head when she heard where I was going, but she did not say nay, and so it was settled.

It was a good four miles of a walk, but when we reached it you would not wish to see a more cosey little house, all honeysuckle and creepers, with a wooden porch and lattice windows. A common-looking woman opened the door for us.

"Miss Hinton can not see you," said she.

"But she asked us to come," said Jim.

"I can't help that," cried the woman, in a rude voice. "I tell you that she can't see you."

We stood irresolute for a minute.

"Maybe you would just tell her I am here," said Jim at last.

"Tell her! How am I to tell her when she couldn't so much as hear a pistol in her ears. Try and tell her yourself, if you have a mind to." She threw open a door as she spoke, and there in a reclining chair at the farther end of the room we caught a glimpse of a figure all lumped together, huge and shapeless, with tails of black hair hanging down. The sound of dreadful swine-like breathing fell upon our ears. It was but a glance, and then we were off hot-foot for home. As for me, I was so young that I was not sure whether this was funny or terrible, but when I looked at Jim, to see how he took it, he was looking quite white and ill.

"You'll not tell any one, Roddy?" said he.

"Not unless it's my mother."

"I won't even tell my uncle. I'll say she was ill, the poor lady! It's enough that we should have seen her in her shame, without its being the gossip of the village. It makes me feel sick and heavy at heart."

"She was so yesterday, Jim."

"Was she? I never marked it. But I know that she has kind eyes and a kind heart, for I saw the one in the other when she looked at me. Maybe it's the want of a friend that has driven her to this."

It blighted his spirits for days, and when it had all gone from my mind it was brought back to me by his manner. But it was not to be our last memory of the lady with the scarlet pelisse, for before the week was out Jim came round to ask me if I would again go up with him.

"My uncle has had a letter," said he. "She would speak with me, and I would be easier if you came with me, Rod."

For me it was only a pleasure outing, but I could see, as we drew near the house, that Jim was troubling in his mind lest we should find that things were amiss. His fears were soon set at rest, however, for we had scarce clicked the garden gate before the woman was out of the door of the cottage and running down the path to meet us. She was so strange a figure, with some sort of purple wrapper on, and her big flushed face smiling out of it, that I might, if I had been alone, have taken to my heels at the sight of her. Even Jim stopped for a moment as if he were not very sure of himself, but her hearty ways soon set us at our ease.

“It is indeed good of you to come and see an old lonely woman,” said she, “and I owe you an apology that I should give you a fruitless journey on Tuesday, but in a sense you were yourselves the cause of it, since the thought of your coming had excited me, and any excitement throws me into a nervous fever. My poor nerves! You can see yourselves how they serve me.”

She held out her twitching hands as she spoke. Then she passed one of them through Jim’s arm, and walked with him up the path.

“You must let me know you and know you well,” said she. “Your uncle and aunt are quite old acquaintances of mine, and though you can not remember me if I have held you in my arms when you were an infant.—Tell me, little man,” she added, turning to me, “what do you call your friend?”

“Boy Jim, mam,” said I.

“Then if you will not think me forward I will call you Boy Jim also. We elderly people have our privileges, you know. And now you will come in with me and we will take a dish of tea together."

She led the way into a cosy room, the same which we had caught a glimpse of when first we came, and there in the middle was a table with white napery and shining glass and gleaming china, and red-cheeked apples piled up on a centre dish, and a great plateful of smoking muffins which the cross-faced maid had just carried in. You can think that we did justice to all the good things, and Miss Hinton would ever keep pressing us to pass our cup and fill our plate. Twice during our meal she rose from her chair and withdrew into a cupboard at the end of the room, and each time I saw Jim's face cloud, for we heard a gentle click of glass against glass.

"Come, now; little man," said she to me when the table had been cleared. "Why are you looking round so much?"

"Because there are so many pretty things upon the walls."

"And which do you think the prettiest of them?"

"Why, that!" said I, pointing to a picture which hung opposite to me. It was of a tall and slender girl, with the rosiest cheeks and the tenderest eyes—so daintily dressed, too, that I had never seen anything more perfect. She had a posy of flowers in her hand and another one was lying upon the planks of wood upon which she was standing.

“Oh, that’s the prettiest, is it?” said she, laughing. “Well, now, walk up to it and let us hear what is writ beneath it.”

I did as she asked, and read out: “Miss Polly Hinton as Peggy, in the Country Wife, played for her benefit at the Haymarket Theatre, September 14, 1780!”

“It’s a play actress,” said I.

“Oh, you rude little boy, to say it in such a tone!” said she; “as if a play actress wasn’t as good as any one else. Why, ’twas but the other day that the Duke of Clarence, who may come to call himself King of England, married Mrs. Jordan, who was herself only a play actress. And whom think you that this one is?” She stood under the picture with her arms folded across her great body and her big black eyes looking from one to the other of us.

“Why, where are your eyes?” she cried at last. “I was Miss Polly Hinton of the Haymarket Theatre. And perhaps you never heard the name before.”

We were compelled to confess that we never had. And the very name of play actress had filled us both with a kind of vague horror like the country-bred folk that we were. To us they were a class apart, to be hinted at rather than named, with the wrath of the Almighty hanging over them like a thundercloud. Indeed, his judgments seemed to be in visible operation before us when we looked upon what this woman was and what she had been.

“Well,” said she, laughing like one who is hurt, “you have no cause to say anything, for I read on your faces what you have been taught to think of me. So this is the upbringing you have had, Jim, to think evil of that which you do not understand! I wish you had been in the theatre that very night with Prince Florizel and four dukes in the boxes, and all the wits and macaronis of London rising at me in the pit. If Lord Avon had not given me a cast in his carriage I had never got the flowers back to my lodgings in York Street, Westminster. And now two little country lads are sitting in judgment upon me.”

Jim’s pride brought a flush to his cheeks, for he did not like to be called a country lad, or to have it supposed that he was so far behind the grand folk in London.

“I have never been inside a playhouse,” said he. “I know nothing of them.”

“Nor I either.”

“Well,” said she, “I am not in voice, and it is ill to play in a little room, with but two to listen, but you must conceive me to be the queen of the Peruvians, who is exhorting her countrymen to rise up against the Spaniards who are oppressing them."

And straightway that coarse, swollen woman became a queen, the grandest, haughtiest queen that you could dream of, and she turned upon us with such words of fire, such lightning eyes and sweeping of her white hand, that she held us spell-bound in our chairs. Her voice was soft and sweet and persuasive at the first, but louder it rang, and louder, as it spoke of wrongs and freedom, and the joys of death in a good cause, until it thrilled into my every nerve, and I asked nothing more than to run out of the cottage and to die then and there in the cause of my country. And then in an instant she changed. She was a poor woman now, who had lost her only child, and who was bewailing it. Her voice was full of tears, and what she said was so simple, so true, that we both seemed to see the dead babe stretched there on the carpet before us, and we could have joined in with words of pity and of grief. And then, before our cheeks were dry, she was back into her old self again.

"How like you that, then?" she cried. "That was my way in the days when Sally Siddons would turn green at the name of Polly Hinton. It's a fine play, is 'Pizarro.'"

"And who wrote it, mam?"

"Who wrote it? I never heard. What matter who did the writing of it! But there are some great lines for one who knows how they should be spoken."

"And you play no longer, mam?"

"No, Jim, I left the boards when—when I was weary of them. But my heart goes back to them sometimes. It seems to me that there is no smell like that of the hot oil in the footlights, and of the oranges in the pit. But you are sad, Jim."

"It was but the thought of that poor woman and her child."

"Tut, never think about her! I will soon wipe her from your mind. This is Miss Priscilla Tomboy from 'The Romp.' You must conceive that the mother is speaking, and that the forward young minx is answering."

And she began a scene between the two of them, so exact in voice and manner that it seemed to us as if there were really two folk before us, the stern old mother, with her hand up like an ear-trumpet, and her flouncing, bouncing daughter. Her great figure danced about with a wonderful lightness, and she tossed her head and pouted her lips as she answered back to the old bent figure that addressed her. Jim and I had forgotten our tears and were holding our ribs before she came to the end of it.

"That is better," said she, smiling at our laughter. "I would not have you go back to Friar's Oak with long faces, or maybe they would not let you come to me again." She vanished into her cupboard and came out with a bottle and glass, which she placed upon the table.

"You are too young for strong waters," she said, "but this talking gives me a dryness and——"

Then it was that Boy Jim did a wonderful thing. He rose from his chair and he laid his hand upon the bottle.

"Don't!" said he.

She looked him in the face, and I can still see those black eyes of hers softening before his gaze.

"Am I to have none?"

"Please don't."

With a quick movement she wrested the bottle out of his hand and raised it up so that for a moment it entered my head that she was about to drink it off. Then she flung it through the open lattice, and we heard the crash of it on the path outside.

"There, Jim!" said she. "Does that satisfy you? It's long since any one cared whether I drank or no."

"You are too good and kind for that," said he.

"Good!" she cried. "Well, I love that you should think me so. And it would make you happier if I kept from the brandy, Jim? Well, then I'll make you a promise if you'll make me one in return."

"What's that, miss?"

"No drop shall pass my lips, Jim, if you will swear, wet or shine, blow or snow, to come up here twice in every week that I may see you and speak with you, for, indeed, there are times when I am very lonesome."

So the promise was made, and very faithfully did Jim keep it, for many a time when I have wanted him to go fishing or rabbit snaring he has remembered that it was his day for Miss Hinton, and has tramped off to Anstey Cross. At first I think that she found her share of the bargain hard to keep, and I have seen Jim come back with a black face on him, as if things were going amiss. But after a time the fight was won, as all fights are won if one does but fight long enough, and in the year before my father came back Miss Hinton had become another woman. And it was not her ways only, but herself as well, for from being the person that I have described, she became in one twelvemonth as fine a looking lady as there was in the whole countryside. Jim was prouder of it by far than of anything he had a hand in in his life, but it was only to me that he ever spoke about it, for he had that tenderness toward her that one has for those whom we have helped. And she helped him also, for by her talk of the world and of what she had seen, she took his mind away from the Sussex countryside and prepared it for a broader life beyond. So matters stood between them at the time when peace was made, and my father came home from the sea.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PEACE OF AMIENS.

MANY a woman's knee was on the ground and many a woman's soul spent itself in joy and thankfulness when the news came with the fall of the leaf in 1801 that the preliminaries of peace had been settled. All England waved her gladness by day and twinkled it by night. Even in little Friar's Oak we had our flags flying bravely, and a candle in every window, with a big G. R. fluttering in the wind over the door of the inn. Folk were weary of the war, for we had been at it for eight years, taking Holland and Spain and France each in turn, and all together. All that we had learned during that time was that our little army was no match for the French on land, and that our large navy was more than a match for them upon the water. We had gained some credit, which we were sorely in need of after the American business, and a few colonies, which were welcome also for the same reason, but our debt had gone on rising and our consols sinking until even Pitt stood aghast. Still, if we had known that there never could be peace between Napoleon and ourselves, and that this was only the end of a round and not of the battle, we should have been better advised had we fought it out without a break. As it was the French got back the twenty thousand good seamen whom we had captured, and a fine dance they led us with their Boulogne flotillas and fleets of invasion before we were able to catch them again.

My father, as I remember him best, was a tough, strong, little man, of no great breadth, but solid and well put together. His face was burned of a reddish colour, as bright as a flower-pot, and in spite of his age (for he was only forty at the time of which I speak) it was shot with lines which deepened if he were in any way perturbed, so that I have seen him turn on the instant from a youngish man to an elderly. His eyes especially were meshed round with wrinkles, as is natural for one who had puckered them all his life in facing foul wind and bitter weather. Those eyes were perhaps his strongest feature, for they were of a very clear and beautiful blue, which shone the brighter out of that ruddy setting. By nature he must have been a fair-skinned man, for his upper brow, where his hat came over it, was as white as mine, and his close-cropped hair was tawny.

He had served, as he was proud to say, in the last of our ships which had been chased out of the Mediterranean in '97, and in the first which had re-entered it in '98. He was under Miller, as third lieutenant of the Theseus, when our fleet, like a pack of eager foxhounds in a covert, was dashing from Sicily to Syria, and back again to Naples, trying to pick up the lost scent. With the same good fighting man he served at the Nile, where the men of his command sponged and rammed and trained until, when the last tri-colour had come down, they hove up the sheet anchor and fell dead asleep upon the top of each other under the capstan bars. Then, as a second lieutenant, he was in one of these grim three-deckers with powder-blackened hulls and crimson scupper holes, their spare cables tied round their keels and over their bulwarks, to hold them together, which carried the news into the bay of Naples. Thence, as a reward for his services, he was transferred as first lieutenant to the Aurora frigate, engaged in cutting off supplies from Genoa, and in her he still remained until long after peace was declared.

How well I can remember his home-coming! Though it is now eight and forty years ago, it is clearer to me than the doings of last week, for the memory of an old man is like one of those glasses which shows out what is at a distance and blurs all that is near.

My mother had been in a tremble ever since the first rumour of the preliminaries came to our ears, for she knew that he might come as soon as his message. She said little, but she saddened my life by insisting that I should be forever clean and tidy. With every rumble of wheels, too, her eyes would fly toward the door and her hands steal up to smooth her pretty black hair. She had embroidered a white "welcome" upon a blue ground, with an anchor in red upon each side, and a border of laurel leaves, and this was to hang upon the two lilac bushes which flanked the cottage door. He could not have left the Mediterranean before we had this finished, and every morning she looked to see if it were in its place and ready to be hanged.

But it was a weary time before the peace was ratified, and it was April of next year before our great day came round to us. It had been raining all morning, I remember—a soft, spring rain, which sent up a rich smell from the brown earth, and pattered pleasantly upon the budding chestnuts behind our cottage. The sun had shone out in the evening, and I had come down with my fishing rod (for I had promised Boy Jim to go with him to the millstream), when what should I see but a postchaise with two smoking horses at the gate, and there in the open door of it were my mother's black skirt and her little feet jutting out, with two blue arms for a waist belt, and all the rest of her buried in the chaise! Away I ran for the motto, and I pinned it up on the bushes as we had agreed. When I had finished there were the skirts and the feet and the blue arms just the same as before.

"Here's Rod," said my mother at last, struggling down on to the ground again. "Roddy, darling, here's your father!"

I saw the red face and the kindly light blue eyes looking out at me. "Why, Roddy, lad, you were but a child, and we kissed good-bye when last we met, but I suppose we must put you on a different rating now. I'm right glad from my heart to see you, dear lad, and as to you, sweetheart——!" The blue arms flew out and there were the skirt and the two feet fixed in the door again.

"Here are the folk coming, Anson," said my mother, blushing. "Won't you get out and come in with us?"

And then suddenly it came home to us both that for all his cheery face he had never moved more than his arms, and that his leg was resting on the opposite seat of the chaise.

“O Anson, Anson!” she cried.

“Tut, 'tis but the bone of my leg,” said he, taking his knee between his hands and lifting it round. “I got it broke in the bay, but the surgeon has fished it and spliced it, though it's a bit crank yet. Why, bless her kindly heart, if I haven't turned her from pink to white. You can see for yourself that it's nothing!”

He sprang out as he spoke, and with one leg and a staff he hopped swiftly up the path, and under the laurel-bordered motto, and so over his own threshold for the first time for five years. When the postboy and I had carried up the sea chest and the two canvas bags there he was sitting in his armchair by the window in his old weather-stained blue coat. My mother was weeping over his poor leg, and he patting her hair with one brown hand. His other he threw round my waist and drew me to the side of his chair.

“Now that we have peace I can lie up and refit until King George wants me again,” said he. “'Twas a carronade that came adrift in the bay when it was blowing a topgallant breeze with a beam sea. Ere we could make it fast it had me jammed against the mast. Well, well!”

he added, looking around at the walls of the room. "Here are all my old curios, the same as ever, the narwhal's horn from the Arctic, and the blowfish from the Moluccas, and the paddles from Fiji, and the picture of the Ca Ira with Lord Hobham in chase. And here you are, Mary, and you also, Roddy, and good luck to the carronade which has sent me into so snug a harbour without fear of sailing orders."

My mother had his long pipe and his tobacco all ready for him, so that he was able now to light it, and to sit looking from one of us to the other and then back again, as if he could never see enough of us. Young as I was, I could still understand that this was the moment which he had thought of during many a lonely watch, and that the expectation of it had cheered his heart in many a dark hour. Sometimes he would touch one of us with his hand, and sometimes the other, and so he sat, with his soul too satiated for words, while the shadows gathered in the little room, and the lights of the inn windows glimmered through the gloom. And then, after my mother had lit our own lamp, she slipped suddenly down upon her knees, and he got one knee to the ground also, so that, hand in hand, they joined their thanks to Heaven for manifold mercies. When I look back at my parents as they were in those days, it is at that very moment that I can picture them most clearly, her sweet face, with the wet shining upon her cheeks, and his blue eyes upturned to the smoke-blackened ceiling. I remember that he swayed his reeking pipe in the earnestness of his prayer, so that I was half tears and half smiles as I watched him.

“Roddy, lad,” said he, after supper was over, “you’re getting a man now, and I suppose you will go afloat like the rest of us. You’re old enough to strap a dirk to your thigh.”

“And leave me without a child as well as without a husband?” cried my mother.

“Well, there’s time enough yet,” said he, “for they are more inclined to empty berths than to fill them, now that peace has come. But I’ve never tried what all this schooling has done for you, Rodney. You have had a great deal more than ever I had, but I dare say I can make shift to test it. Have you learned history?”

“Yes, father,” said I, with some confidence.

“Then how many sail of the line were at the battle of Camperdown?”

He shook his head gravely when he found that I could not answer him.

“Why, there are men in the fleet who never had any schooling at all who could tell you that we had seven seventy-fours, seven sixty-fours, and two fifty-gun ships in the action. There's a picture on the wall of the chase of the Ça Ira. Which were the ships that laid her aboard?"

Again I had to confess that he had beaten me.

"Well, your dad can teach you something in history yet," he cried, looking in triumph at my mother. "Have you learned geography?"

"Yes, father," said I, though with less confidence than before.

"Well, how far is it from Port Mahon to Algeciras?"

I could only shake my head.

"If Ushant lay three leagues upon your star-board quarter, what would be your nearest English port?"

Again I had to give it up.

"Well, I don't see that your geography is much better than your history," said he. "You'd never get your certificate at this rate. Can you do addition? Well, then, let us see if you can tot up my prize money."

He shot a mischievous glance at my mother as he spoke, and she laid down her knitting in her lap and looked very earnestly at him.

"You never asked me about that, Mary," said he.

"The Mediterranean is not the station for it, Anson. I have heard you say it is the Atlantic for prize money and the Mediterranean for honour."

"I had a share of both last cruise, which comes from changing a line-of-battle ship for a frigate. Now, Rodney, there are two pounds in every hundred due to me when the prize courts have done with them. When we were watching Massena off Genoa we got a matter of seventy schooners, brigs, and tartans, with wine, food, and powder. Lord Keith will want his finger in the pie, but that's for the courts to settle. Put them at four pounds apiece to me, and what will the seventy bring?"

"Two hundred and eighty pounds," I answered.

"Why, Anson, it is a fortune!" cried my mother, clapping her hands.

"Try it again, Roddy!" said he, shaking his pipe at me. "There was the xebec frigate out of Barcelona, with twenty thousand Spanish dollars aboard, which make four thousand of our pounds. Her hull should be worth another thousand. What's my share of that?"

"A hundred pounds."

"Why, the purser couldn't work it out quicker," he cried in his delight. "Here's for you again! We passed the straits and worked up to the Azores, where we fell in with the La Sabina, from the Mauritius, with sugar and spices. Twelve hundred pounds she's worth to me, Mary, my darling, and never again shall you soil your pretty fingers or pinch upon my beggarly pay."

My dear mother had borne her long struggle without a sign all these years, but now that she was so suddenly eased of it she fell sobbing upon his neck. It was a long time before my father had a thought to spare upon my examination in arithmetic.

"It's all in your lap, Mary," said he, dashing his own hand across his eyes. "By George! lass, when this leg of mine is sound we'll bear down for a spell to Brighton, and if there is a smarter frock than yours upon the Steyne may I never tread a poop again. But how is it that you are so quick at figures, Rodney, when you know nothing of history or geography?"

I tried to explain that addition was the same upon sea or land, but that history and geography were not.

"Well," he concluded, "you need figures to take a reckoning, and you need nothing else save what your mother wit will teach you. There never was one of our breed who did not take to salt water like a young gull. Lord Nelson has promised me a vacancy for you, and he'll be as good as his word."

So it was that my father came home to us, and a better or kinder no lad could wish for. Though my parents had been married so long they had really seen very little of each other, and their affection was as warm and fresh as if they were two newly wedded lovers. I have learned since that sailors can be coarse and foul, but never did I know it from my father, for, although he had seen as much rough work as the wildest could wish for, he was always the same patient, good-humoured man, with a smile and a kindly word for all the village. He could suit himself to his company, too, for on the one hand he could take his wine with the vicar, or with Sir James Ovington, the squire of the parish, while on the other he would sit by the hour among my humble friends down in the smithy, with Champion Harrison, Boy Jim and the rest of them, telling them such stories of Nelson and his men that I have seen the champion knot his great hands together, while Jim's eyes have smouldered like the forge embers as he listened.

My father had been placed on half-pay, like so many other of the old war officers, and so for nearly two years he was able to remain with us. During all this time I can only once remember that there was the slightest disagreement between him and my mother. It chanced that I was the cause of it, and as great events sprang out of it, I must tell you how it came about. It was indeed the first of a series of events which affected not only my fortunes, but those of very much more important people.

The spring of 1803 was an early one, and the middle of April saw the leaves thick upon the chestnut trees. One evening we were all seated over a dish of tea when we heard the scrunch of steps outside our door, and there was the postman with a letter in his hand.

"I think it is for me," said my mother, and, sure enough, it was addressed, in the most beautiful writing, to Mrs. Mary Stone of Friar's Oak, and there was a red seal the size of a half-crown upon the outside of it, with a flying dragon in the middle.

"Whom think you that it is from, Anson?" she asked.

"I had hoped it was for me and from Lord Nelson," answered my father. "It is time the boy had his commission. But if it be for you then it can not be from any one of much importance."

"Can it not!" she cried, pretending to be offended. "You will ask my pardon for that speech, sir, for it is from no less a person than Sir Charles Tregellis, my own brother."

My mother spoke with a hushed voice when she mentioned this wonderful brother of hers, and always had done so as long as I can remember, so that I had learned also to have a subdued and reverent feeling when I heard his name. And indeed it was no wonder, for that name was never mentioned unless it were in connection with something brilliant and extraordinary. Once we heard that he was at Windsor with the king. Often he was at Brighton with the prince. Sometimes it was as a sportsman that his reputation reached us, as when his Meteor beat the Duke of Queensberry's Egham at Newmarket, or when he brought Jim Belcher up from Bristol and sprung him upon the London Fancy. But usually it was as the friend of the great, the arbiter of fashions, the king of bucks and the best dressed man in town that his reputation reached us. My father, however, did not appear to be elated at my mother's triumphant rejoinder.

"Ay, and what does he want?" asked he, in no very amiable voice.

"I wrote to him, Anson, and told him that Rodney was growing a man now, thinking that since he had no wife or child of his own he might be disposed to advance him."

"We can do very well without him," growled my father. "He sheered off from us when the weather was foul, and we have no need of him now that the sun is shining."

"Nay, you misjudge him, Anson," said my mother, warmly. "There is no one with a better heart than Charles, but his own life moves so smoothly that he can not understand that others may have trouble. During all these years I have known that I had but to say the word to receive as much as I wished from him."

"Thank God that you never had to stoop to it, Mary! I want none of his help."

"But we must think of Rodney."

"Rodney has enough for his sea chest and kit. He needs no more."

"But Charles has great power and influence in London. He could make Rodney known to all the great people. Surely you would not stand in the way of his advancement."

"Let us hear what he says, then," said my father, and this was the letter which she read to him:

14 JERMYN ST., ST. JAMES', April 15, 1803.

MY DEAR SISTER MARY: In answer to your letter I can assure you that you must not conceive me to be wanting in those finer feelings which are the chief adornment of humanity. It is true that for some years, absorbed as I have been in affairs of the highest importance, I have seldom taken a pen in hand, for which I can assure you that I have been reproached by many des plus charmantes of your charming sex. At the present moment I lie abed (having stayed late in order to pay a compliment to the Marchioness of Dover at her ball last night), and this is writ to my dictation by Ambrose, my clever rascal of a valet. I am interested to hear of my nephew Rodney (mon Dieu, quel nom!), and as I shall be on my way to visit the prince at Brighton next week, I shall break my journey at Friar's Oak for the sake of seeing both you and him. Make my compliments to your husband. I am ever, my dear sister Mary, your brother,

CHARLES TREGELLIS.

“What do you think of that?” cried my mother in triumph, when she had finished.

“I think it is the letter of a fop,” said my father, blunty.

“You are too hard on him, Anson. You will think better of him when you know him. But he says that he will be here next week, and this is Thursday, and the best curtains unhung, and no lavender in the sheets!" Away she bustled, half distracted, while my father sat moody, with his chin upon his hands, and I remained lost in wonder at the thought of this grand new relative from London and of all that his coming might mean to us.

CHAPTER V.

BUCK TREGELLIS.

Now that I was in my seventeenth year, and had already some need for a razor, I had begun to weary of the narrow life of the village, and to long to see something of the great world beyond. And the craving was all the stronger because I durst not speak openly about it, for the least hint of it brought the tears into my mother's eyes. But now there was the less reason that I should stay at home, since my father was at her side, and so my mind was all filled by this prospect of my uncle's visit, and of the chance that he might set my feet moving at last upon the road of life.

As you may think it was toward my father's profession that my thoughts and my hopes turned, for from my childhood I have never seen the heave of the sea or tasted the salt upon my lips without feeling the blood of five generations of seamen thrill within my veins. And think of the challenge which was ever waving in those days before the eyes of a coast-living lad! I had but to walk up to Wolstonbury in the war time to see the sails of the French chasse-marées and privateers. Again and again I have heard the roar of the guns coming from far out over the waters. Seamen would tell us how they had left London and been engaged ere nightfall, or sailed out of Portsmouth and been yardarm to yardarm before they had lost sight of St. Helen's light. It was this imminence of the danger which warmed our hearts to our sailors, and made us talk round the winter fires of our little Nelson and Cuddie Collingwood and Johnnie Jarvis, and the rest of them, not as being great high admirals with titles and dignities, but as good friends whom we loved and honoured above all others. What boy was there through the length and breadth of Britain who did not long to be out with them under the red cross flag!

But now that peace had come, and the fleets which had swept the channel and the Mediterranean were lying dismantled in our harbours, there was less to draw one's fancy seaward. It was London now of which I thought by day and brooded by night, the huge city, the home of the wise and the great, from which came this constant stream of carriages and those crowds of dusty people who were forever flashing past our window pane. It was this one side of life which first presented itself to me, and so as a boy I used to picture the city as a gigantic stable with a huge huddle of coaches, which were forever streaming off down the country roads. But then Champion Harrison told me how the fighting men lived there, and my father how the heads of the navy lived there, and my mother how her brother and his grand friends were there, until at last I was consumed with impatience to see this marvellous heart of England. This coming of my uncle then was the breaking of light through the darkness, though I hardly dared to hope that he would take me with him into those high circles in which he lived. My mother, however, had such confidence either in his good nature or in her own powers of persuasion that she already began to make furtive preparations for my departure.

But if the narrowness of the village life chafed my easy spirit it was a torture to the keen and ardent mind of Boy Jim. It was but a few days after the coming of my uncle's letter that we walked over the Downs together, and I had a peep of the bitterness of his heart.

"What is there for me to do, Rodney?" he cried. "I forge a shoe and I fuller it, and I clip it, and I calkin it, and I knock five holes in it, and there it is finished. Then I do it again and again, and blow up the bellows and feed the forge, and rasp a hoof or two, and there it is done, and every day the same as the other. Was it for this only, do you think, that I was born into the world?"

I looked at him, his proud, eagle face, and his tall, sinewy figure, and I wondered whether in the whole land there was a finer, handsomer man.

"The army or the navy is the place for you, Jim," said I.

"That is very well," he cried; "if you go into the navy, as you are likely to do, you go as an officer, and it is you who do the ordering. If I go in, it is as one who was born to receive orders."

"An officer gets his orders from those above him."

"But an officer does not have the lash hung over his head. I saw a poor devil at the inn here—it was some years ago—who showed us his back in the taproom, slashed into red diamonds with the boatswain's whip. 'Who ordered that?' I asked. 'The captain,' said he. 'And what would you have had if you had struck him dead?' said I.

"The yardarm," he answered. "Then, if I had been you that's where I should have been,' said I, and I spoke the truth. I can't help it, Rod! There's something here in my heart, something that is as much a part of myself as this hand is, which holds me to it."

"I know that you are as proud as Lucifer," said I.

"It was born with me, Roddy, and I can't help it. Life would be easier if I could. I was made to be my own master, and there's only one place where I can hope to be so."

"Where is that, Jim?"

"In London. Miss Hinton has told me of it until I feel as if I could find my way through it from end to end. She loves to talk of it as well as I do to listen. I have it all laid out in my mind, and I can see where the playhouses are, and how the river runs, and where the king's house is, and the prince's, and the place where the fighting men live. I could make my name known in London."

"How?"

"Never mind how, Rod, I could do it, and I will do it, too. 'Wait,' says my uncle, 'wait, and it will all come right for you.' That is what he always says, and my aunt the same. Why should I wait? What am I to wait for? No, Roddy, I'll stay no longer eating my heart out in this little village, but I'll leave my apron behind me and I'll seek my fortune in London, and when I come back to Friar's Oak it will be in such style as that gentleman yonder."

He pointed as he spoke, and there was a high crimson curricule coming down the London road, with two bay horses harnessed tandem fashion before it. The reins and fittings were of a light fawn-colour, and the gentleman had a driving coat to match, with a servant in dark livery behind. They flashed past us in a rolling cloud of dust, and I had just a glimpse of the pale, handsome face of the master, and of the dark, shrivelled features of the man. I should never have given them another thought had it not chanced that when the village came into view there was the curricule again standing at the door of the inn, and the grooms busy taking out the horses.

"Jim," I cried, "I believe it is my uncle!" and taking to my heels I ran for home at the top of my speed. At the door was standing the dark-faced servant. He carried a cushion upon which lay a small fluffy lapdog.

"You will excuse me, young sir," said he, in the suavest, most soothing of voices, "but am I right in supposing that this is the house of Lieutenant Stone? In that case you will, perhaps, do me the favour to hand to Mrs. Stone this note, which her brother, Sir Charles Tregellis, has just committed to my care."

I was quite abashed by the man's flowery way of talking, so unlike anything which I had ever heard. He had a wizened face and sharp little dark eyes which took in me and the house and my mother's startled face at the window all in the instant. My parents were together, the two of them, in the sitting-room, and my mother read the note to us.

"My dear Mary," it ran, "I have stopped at the inn, because I am somewhat ravagé by the dust of your Sussex roads. A lavender-water bath may restore me to a condition in which I may fitly pay my compliments to a lady. Meantime I send you Fidelio as a hostage. Pray give him a half-pint of warmish milk, with six drops of pure brandy in it. A better or more faithful creature never lived. Toujours à toi, Charles."

"Have him in! Have him in!" cried my father heartily, running to the door. "Come in, Mr. Fidelio. Every man to his own taste, and six drops to the half-pint seems a sinful watering of grog, but if you like it, so you shall have it."

A smile flickered over the dark face of the servant, but his features reset themselves instantly into their usual mask of respectful observance.

“You are labouring under a slight error, sir, if you will permit me to say so. My name is Ambrose, and I have the honour to be the valet of Sir Charles Tregellis. This is Fidelio upon the cushion.”

“Tut, the dog!” cried my father in disgust. “Heave him down by the fireside. Why should he have brandy when many a Christian has to go without?”

“Hush, Anson!” said my mother, taking the cushion.—“You will tell Sir Charles that his wishes will be carried out, and that we shall expect him at his own convenience.”

The man went off noiselessly and swiftly, but was back in a few minutes with a flat brown basket.

“It is the refection, madame,” said he. “Will you permit me to lay the table? Sir Charles is accustomed to partake of certain dishes and to drink certain wines, so that we usually bring them with us when we visit.” He opened the basket, and in a minute he had the table shining with silver and glass and studded with dishes. So quick and neat and silent was he in all that he did that my father was as taken with him as I was.

“You’d have made a right good foretopman, if your heart is as stout as your fingers are quick,” said he. "Did you never wish to have the honour of serving your country?"

"It is my honour, sir, to serve Sir Charles Tregellis, and I desire no other master," he answered. "But I will convey his dressing case from the inn, and then all will be ready."

He came back with a great silver-mounted box under his arm, and close at his heels was the gentleman whose coming had made such a disturbance.

My first impression of my uncle as he entered the room was that one of his eyes was swollen to the size of an apple. It took the breath from my lips, that monstrous, glistening eye. But the next instant I perceived that he held a round glass in front of it, which magnified it in this fashion. He looked at us each in turn, and then he bowed very gracefully to my mother and kissed her upon either cheek.

"You will permit me to compliment you, my dear Mary," said he in a voice which was the most mellow and beautiful that I have ever heard. "I can assure you that the country air has used you wondrous well, and that I should be proud to see my pretty sister in the Mall.—I am your servant, sir," he continued, holding out his hand to my father. "It was but last week that I had the honour of dining with my friend Lord St.

"I find him very passable, Mary."

Vincent, and I took occasion to mention you to him. I may tell you that your name is not forgotten at the admiralty, sir, and I hope that I may see you soon walking the poop of a seventy-four gunship of your own.—So this is my nephew, is it?" He put a hand upon each of my shoulders in a very friendly way and looked me up and down.

"How old are you, nephew?" he asked.

"Seventeen, sir."

"You look older. You look eighteen at the least.—I find him very passable, Mary—very passable indeed. He has not the bel air, the tournure—in our uncouth English we have no word for it. But he is as healthy as a May hedge in bloom."

So within a minute of his entering our door he had got himself upon terms with all of us, and with so easy and graceful a manner that it seemed as if he had known us all for years. I had a good look at him now as he stood upon the hearthrug with my mother upon one side and my father on the other. He was a very large man, with noble shoulders, small waist, broad hips, well-turned legs, and the smallest of hands and feet. His face was pale and handsome, with a prominent chin, a jutting nose, and large blue, staring eyes, in which a sort of dancing mischievous light was forever playing. He wore a deep brown coat with a collar as high as his ears and tails as low as his knees. His black breeches and silk stockings ended in very small pointed shoes, so highly polished that they twinkled with every movement. His vest was of black velvet, open at the top, to show an embroidered shirt front, with a high, smooth white cravat above it, which kept his neck forever on the stretch. He stood easily with one thumb in his armpit, and two fingers of the other hand in his vest pocket. It made me proud as I watched him to think that so magnificent a man should be my own blood relation, and I could see from my mother's eyes as they turned toward him that the same thought was in her mind.

All this time Ambrose had been standing like a dark-clothed, bronze-faced image by the door, with the big silver-bound box under his arm. He stepped forward now into the room.

"Shall I convey it to your bedchamber, Sir Charles?" he asked.

"Ah, pardon me, sister Mary," cried my uncle. "I am old-fashioned enough to have principles—an anachronism, I know, in this lax age. One of them is never to allow my batterie de toilette out of my sight when I am travelling. I can not readily forget the agonies which I endured some years ago through neglecting this precaution. I will do Ambrose the justice to say that it was before he took charge of my affairs. I was compelled to wear the same ruffles upon two consecutive days! On the third morning my fellow was so affected by the sight of my condition that he burst into tears and laid out a pair which he had stolen from me."

As he spoke his face was very grave, but the light in his eyes danced and gleamed. He handed his open snuffbox to my father as Ambrose followed my mother out of the room.

"You number yourself in an illustrious company by dipping your finger and thumb into it," said he.

"Indeed, sir!" said my father.

"You are free of my box as being a relative by marriage. You are free also, nephew, and I pray you to take a pinch. It is the most intimate sign of my good will. Outside ourselves there are four, I think, who have had access to it—the prince, of course, Mr. Pitt, Monsieur Otto, the French ambassador, and Lord Hawkesbury. I have sometimes thought that I was premature with Lord Hawkesbury."

"I am vastly honoured, sir," said my father, looking suspiciously at his guest from under his shaggy eyebrows, for with that grave face and those twinkling eyes it was hard to know how to take him.

“A woman, sir, has her love to bestow,” said my uncle. “A man has his snuffbox. Neither is to be lightly offered. It is a lapse of taste; nay, more, it is a breach of morals. Only the other day as I was seated in Watier’s, my box of prime Macouba open upon the table beside me, an Irish bishop thrust in his intrusive fingers. ‘Waiter,’ I cried, ‘my box has been soiled! Remove it!’ The man meant no insult, you understand, but that class of people must be kept in their proper sphere.”

“A bishop!” cried my father. “You draw your line very high, sir.”

“Yes, sir,” said my uncle. “I wish no better epitaph upon my tombstone.”

My mother had in the meantime descended, and we all drew up to the table.

“You will excuse my apparent grossness, Mary, in venturing to bring my own larder with me. Abernethy has me under his orders, and I must eschew your rich country dainties. A little white wine and a cold quail—it is as much as the niggardly Scotchman will allow me.”

“We should have you on blockading service when the levanters are blowing,” said my father. “Salt junk and weevily biscuits, with a rib of a tough Barbary ox when the tenders come in. You would have your spare diet there, sir."

Straightway my uncle began to question him about the sea service, and for the whole meal my father was telling him of the Nile and of the Toulon blockade, and the siege of Genoa and all that he had seen and done. But whenever he faltered for a word my uncle always had it ready for him, and it was hard to say which knew most about the business.

"No, I read little or nothing," said he, when my father marvelled where he got his knowledge. "The fact is that I can hardly pick up a print without seeing some allusion to myself, 'Sir C—s T—s does this,' or 'Sir C—s T—s says the other,' so I take them no longer. But if a man is in my position all knowledge comes to him. The Duke of York tells me of the army in the morning, and Lord Spencer chats with me of the navy in the afternoon, and Dundas whispers me what is going forward in the cabinet, so that I have little need of the Times or the Morning Chronicle."

This set him talking of the great world of London, telling my father about the men who were his masters at the admiralty, and my mother about the beauties of the town and the great ladies at Almack's, but all in the same light, fanciful way, so that one never knew whether to laugh or to take him gravely. I think it flattered him to see the way in which we all three hung upon his words. Of some he thought highly and of some lowly, but he made no secret that the highest of all and the one against whom all others should be measured was Sir Charles Tregellis himself.

“As to the king,” said he, “of course, I am l’ami de famille there, and even with you I can scarce speak freely, as my relations are confidential.”

“God bless him and keep him from ill!” cried my father.

“It is pleasant to hear you say so,” said my uncle. “One has to come into the country to hear honest loyalty, for a sneer and a gibe are more the fashions in town. The king is grateful to me for the interest which I have ever shown in his son. He likes to think that the prince has a man of taste in his circle.”

“And the prince?” asked my mother, “is he well favoured?”

“He is a fine figure of a man. At a distance he has been mistaken for me. And he has some taste in dress, though he gets slovenly if I am too long away from him. I warrant you that I find a crease in his coat to-morrow.”

We were all seated round the fire by this time, for the evening had turned chilly. The lamp was lighted and so also was my father's pipe.

"I suppose," said he, "that this is your first visit to Friar's Oak."

My uncle's face turned suddenly very grave and stern.

"It is my first visit for many years," said he. "I was but one and twenty years of age when last I came here. I am not likely to forget it."

I knew that he spoke of his visit to Cliffe Royal at the time of the murder, and I saw by her face that my mother knew it also. My father, however, had either never heard of it, or had forgotten the circumstance.

"Was it at the inn you staid?" he asked.

"I staid with the unfortunate Lord Avon. It was the time when he was accused of slaying his younger brother and fled from the country."

We all fell silent, and my uncle leaned his chin upon upon his hand, looking thoughtfully into the fire. If I do but close my eyes now I can see the light upon his proud, handsome face, and see also my dear father, concerned at having touched upon so terrible a memory, shooting little anxious glances at him between the puffs of his pipe.

"I dare say that it has happened with you, sir," said my uncle at last; "that you have lost some dear messmate in battle or wreck, and that you have put him out of your mind in the routine of your daily life, until suddenly some word or some scene brings him back to your memory, and you find your sorrow as raw as upon the first day of your loss."

My father nodded.

"So it was with me to-night. I never formed a close friendship with a man—I say nothing of women—save only the once. That was with Lord Avon. We were of an age, he a few years perhaps my senior, but our tastes, our judgments, and our character were alike, save only that he had in him a touch of pride such as I have never known in any other man. Putting aside the little foibles of a rich young man of fashion, les indiscretions d'une jeunesse dorée, I could have sworn that he was as good a man as I have ever known."

"How came he then to such a crime?" asked my father.

My uncle shook his head. "Many a time have I asked myself that question, and it comes more home to me to-night than ever." All the jauntiness had gone out of his manner, and he had turned suddenly into a sad and serious man.

"Was it certain that he did it, Charles?" asked my mother.

My uncle shrugged his shoulders. "I wish I could think it were not so. I have thought sometimes that it was this very pride, turning suddenly to madness, which drove him to it. You have heard how he returned the money which we had lost?"

"Nay, I have heard nothing of it," my father answered.

"It is a very old story now, though we have not yet found an end to it. We had played for two days, the four of us, Lord Avon, his brother Captain Barrington, Sir Lothian Hume, and myself. Of the captain I knew little, save that he was not of the best repute, and was deep in the hands of the Jews. Sir Lothian has made an evil name for himself since—'tis the same Sir Lothian who shot Lord Carton in the affair at Chalk farm—but in those days there was nothing against him. The oldest of us was but twenty-four, and we gamed on, as I say, until the captain had cleared the board. We were all hit, but our host far the hardest.

"That night—I tell you now what it would be a bitter thing for me to tell in a court of law—I was restless and sleepless, as often happens when a man has kept awake over long. My mind would dwell upon the fall of the cards, and I was tossing and turning in my bed, when suddenly a cry fell upon my ears, and then a second louder one coming from the direction of Captain Barrington's room. Five minutes later I heard steps passing down the passage, and, without striking a light, I opened my door and peeped out, thinking that some one was taken unwell. There was Lord Avon walking toward me. In one hand he held a guttering candle, and in the other a brown bag, which chinked as he moved. His face was all drawn and distorted—so much so that my question was frozen upon my lips. Before I could utter it he turned into his chamber and softly closed the door.

“Next morning I was awakened by finding him at my bedside. ‘Charles,’ said he, ‘I can not bear to think that you should have lost this money in my house. You will find it here upon your table.’

“It was in vain that I laughed at his squeamishness, telling him that I should most certainly have claimed my money had I won, so that it would be strange, indeed, if I were not permitted to pay it when I lost.

“‘Neither I nor my brother will touch it,’ said he. ‘There it lies and you may do what you like about it.’ He would listen to no argument but dashed out of the room like a madman. But perhaps these details are familiar to you, and God knows they are painful to me to tell!”

My father was sitting with staring eyes and his forgotten pipe reeking in his hand.

"Pray let us hear the end of it, sir!" he cried.

"Well, then, I had finished my toilet in an hour or so—for I was less exigent in those days than now—and I met Sir Lothian Hume at breakfast. His experience had been the same as my own, and he was eager to see Captain Barrington, and to ascertain why he had directed his brother to return the money to us. We were talking the matter over, when suddenly I raised my eyes to the corner of the ceiling, and I saw—I saw——"

My uncle had turned quite pale with the vividness of the memory, and he passed his hand over his eyes.

"It was crimson," said he, with a shudder. "Crimson, with black cracks, and from every crack—but I will give you dreams, sister Mary. Suffice it that we rushed up the stair which led direct to the captain's room, and there we found him lying, with the bone gleaming white through his throat. A hunting knife lay in the room—and the knife was Lord Avon's. A lace ruffle was found in the dead man's grasp—and the ruffle was Lord Avon's. Some papers were found charred in the grate—and the papers were Lord Avon's. O my poor friend, in what moment of madness did you come to do such a deed!"

The light had gone out of my uncle's eyes, and the extravagance from his manner. His speech was clear and plain, with none of those strange London ways which had so amazed me. Here was a second uncle, a man of heart and a man of brains, and I liked him better than the first.

"And what said Lord Avon?" cried my father.

"He said nothing. He went about like one who walks in his sleep, with horror-stricken eyes. None dared arrest him until there should be due inquiry, but when the coroner's court brought wilful murder against him the constables came for him in full cry. But they found him fled. There was a rumour that he had been seen in Westminster in the next week, and then that he had escaped for America, but nothing more is known. It will be a bright day for Sir Lothian Hume when they can prove him dead, for he is next of kin, and till then he can touch neither title nor estate."

The telling of this grim story had cast a chill upon all of us. My uncle held out his hands toward the blaze, and I noticed that they were as white as the ruffles which fringed them.

"I know not how things are at Cliffe Royal now," said he thoughtfully. "It was not a cheery house, even before this shadow fell upon it. A fitter stage was never set forth for such a tragedy. But seventeen years have passed, and perhaps even that horrible ceiling——”

“It still bears the stain,” said I.

I know not which of the three was the more astonished, for my mother had not heard of my adventures of the night. They never took their wondering eyes off me as I told my story, and my heart swelled with pride when my uncle said that we had carried ourselves well, and that he did not think that many of our age would have stood to it as stoutly.

“But as to this ghost, it must have been the creature of your own minds,” said he. “Imagination plays us strange tricks, and though I have as steady a nerve as a man might wish, I can not answer for what I might see if I were to stand under that blood-soaked ceiling at midnight.”

“Uncle,” said I, “I saw a figure as plainly as I see that fire, and I heard the steps as clearly as I hear the crackle of the faggots. Besides, we could not both be deceived.”

“There is truth in that,” said he thoughtfully. “You saw no features, you say?”

“It was too dark.”

“But only a figure?”

“The dark outline of one.”

"And it retreated up the stair?"

"Yes."

"And vanished into the wall?"

"Yes."

"At what part of the wall?" cried a voice from behind us.

My mother screamed, and down came my father's pipe on to the hearthrug. I had sprung round with a catch of my breath, and there was the valet Ambrose, his body in the shadow of the doorway, his dark face protruded into the light, and two burning eyes fixed upon mine.

"What the devil is the meaning of this, sir?" cried my uncle.

It was strange to see the gleam and passion fade out of the man's face, and the demure mask of the valet replace it. His eyes still smouldered, but his features regained their prim composure in an instant.

"I beg your pardon, Sir Charles," said he. "I had come in to ask you if you had any orders for me, and I did not like to interrupt the young gentleman's story. I am afraid that I have been somewhat carried away by it."

"I never knew you to forget yourself before," said my uncle.

"You will, I'm sure, forgive me, Sir Charles, if you will call to mind the relation in which I stood to Lord Avon." He spoke with some dignity of manner, and, with a bow, he left the room.

"We must make some little allowance," said my uncle, with a sudden return to his jaunty manner. "When a man can brew a dish of chocolate or tie a cravat as Ambrose does he may claim consideration. The fact is that the poor fellow was valet to Lord Avon, that he was at Cliffe Royal upon the fatal night of which I have spoken, and that he is most devoted to his old master. But my talk has been somewhat triste, sister Mary, and now we shall return, if you please, to the dresses of the Countess Lieven and the gossip of St. James."

CHAPTER VI.

THE FIRST JOURNEY.

MY father sent me to bed early that night, though I was very eager to stay up, for every word which this man said held my attention. His face, his manner, the large waves and sweeps of his white hands, his easy air of superiority, his fantastic fashion of talk, all filled me with interest and wonder. But, as I afterward learned, this conversation was to be about myself, and my own prospects, so I was despatched to my room, whence far into the night I could hear the deep growl of my father and the rich tones of my uncle, with an occasional gentle murmur from my mother, as they talked in the room beneath.

I had dropped asleep at last, when I was awakened suddenly by something wet being pressed against my face, and by two warm arms, which were cast round me. My mother's cheek was against my own, and I could hear the click of her sobs, and feel her quiver and shake in the darkness. A faint light stole through the latticed window, and I could dimly see that she was in white, with her black hair loose upon her shoulders.

“You won’t forget us, Roddy? You won’t forget us?”

“Why, mother, what is it?”

“Your uncle, Roddy. He is going to take you away from us.”

“When, mother?”

“To-morrow.”

God forgive me, how my heart bounded for joy, when hers, which was within touch of it, was breaking with sorrow!

“O mother!” I cried. “To London?”

“First to Brighton, that he may present you to the prince. Next day to London, where you will meet the great people, Roddy, and learn to look down upon—to look down upon your poor, simple, old-fashioned father and mother.”

I put my arms about her to console her, but she wept so that for all of my seventeen years it set me weeping also, and with such a hiccoughing noise, since I had not a woman’s knack of quiet tears, that it finally turned her own grief to laughter.

“Charles would be flattered if he could see the gracious way in which we receive his kindness," said she. "Be still, Roddy dear, or you will certainly wake him."

"I'll not go if it is to grieve you," I cried.

"Nay, dear, you must go, for it may be the one great chance of your life. And think how proud it will make us all when we hear of you in the company of Charles's grand friends. But you will promise me not to gamble, Roddy? You heard to-night of the dreadful things which come from it."

"I promise you, mother."

"And you will be careful of wine, Roddy? You are young and unused to it."

"Yes, mother."

"And play actresses, also, Roddy. And you will not cast your underclothing until June is in. Young Master Overton came by his death through it. Think well of your dress, Roddy, so as to do your uncle credit, for it is the thing for which he is himself most famed. You have but to do what he will direct. But if there is a time when you are not meeting grand people you can wear out your country things, for your brown coat is as good as new, and the blue one, if it were ironed and relined, would take you through the summer. I have put out your Sunday clothes with the nankeen vest, since you are to see the prince to-morrow, and you will wear your brown silk stockings and buckle shoes. Be guarded in crossing the London streets, for I am told that the hackney coaches are past all imagining. Fold your clothes when you go to bed, Roddy, and do not forget your evening prayers, for oh, my dear boy, the days of temptation are at hand, when I will no longer be with you to help you." So with advice and guidance both for this world and the next did my mother with her soft warm arms around me prepare me for the great step which lay before me.

My uncle did not appear at breakfast in the morning, but Ambrose brewed him a dish of chocolate and took it to his room. When at last, about mid-day, he did descend, he was so fine, with his curled hair, his shining teeth, his quizzing glass, his snow-white ruffles and his laughing eyes, that I could not take my gaze from him.

"Well, nephew," he cried, "what do you think of the prospect of coming to town with me?"

"I thank you, sir, for the kind interest which you take in me," said I.

"But you must be a credit to me, Rodney. My nephew must be of the best if he is to be in keeping with the rest of me."

"You'll find him a chip of good wood, sir," said my father.

U. O. P.

"We must make him a polished chip before we have done with him. Your aim, my dear nephew, must always be to be in bon ton. It is not a case of wealth, you understand. Mere riches can not do it. Golden Price has forty thousand pounds a year, but his clothes are disastrous. I assure you that I saw him come down St. James Street the other day, and I was so shocked at his appearance that I had to step into Vernet's for a glass of orange brandy. No, 'tis a question of natural taste, and of following the advice and example of those who are more experienced than yourself."

"I fear, Charles, that Roddy's wardrobe is country-made," said my mother.

"We shall soon set that right when we get to town; we shall see what Stultz or Weston can do for him," my uncle answered. "We must keep him en retraite until he has some clothes to wear."

This slight upon my best Sunday suit brought a flush to my mother's cheeks, which my uncle instantly observed, for he was quick in noticing trifles.

"The clothes are very well for Friar's Oak, sister Mary," said he. "And yet you can understand that they might seem rococo in the Mall. If you leave him in my hands I shall see to the matter."

“On how much, sir,” asked my father, “can a young man dress in town?”

“With prudence and reasonable care a young man of fashion can dress upon eight hundred pounds a year,” my uncle answered.

I saw my poor father’s face grow longer.

“I fear, sir, that Roddy must keep his country clothes,” said he. “Even with my prize money——”

“Tut, sir!” cried my uncle. “I already owe Weston something over a thousand, so how can a few odd hundreds affect it? If my nephew comes with me, my nephew is my care. The point is settled, and I must refuse to argue upon it.” He waved his white hands as if to brush aside all opposition.

My parents tried to thank him, but he cut them short.

“By the way, now that I am in Friar’s Oak, there is another small piece of business which I have to perform,” said he. “I believe that there is a fighting man named Harrison here, who at one time might have held the championship. In those days poor Avon and I were his principal backers. I should like to have a word with him.”

You may think how proud I was to walk down the village street with my magnificent relative, and to note out of the corner of my eye how the folk came to the doors and windows to see us pass. Champion Harrison was standing outside the smithy, and he pulled his cap off when he saw my uncle.

“God bless me, sir! Who’d ha’ thought of seeing you at Friar’s Oak? Why, Sir Charles, it brings old memories back to look at your face again.”

“Glad to see you looking so fit, Harrison,” said my uncle, running his eyes over him. “Why, with a month’s training you would be as good a man as ever. I don’t suppose you scale more than thirteen and a half.”

“Thirteen ten, Sir Charles. I’m in my forty-first year, but I am sound in wind and limb, and if my old woman would have let me off my promise I’d ha’ had a try with some of these young ones before now. I hear that they’ve got some amazin’ good stuff up from Bristol of late.”

“Yes, the Bristol yellow man has been the winning colour of late.—How d’ye do, Mrs. Harrison? I don’t suppose you remember me.”

She had come out from the house, and I noticed that her worn face—on which some past terror seemed to have left its shadow—hardened into stern lines as she looked at my uncle.

“I remember you too well, Sir Charles Tregellis,” said she. “I trust that you have not come here to-day to try to draw my husband back into the ways that he has forsaken."

"That's the way with her, Sir Charles," said the champion, resting his great hand upon the woman's shoulder. "She's got my promise, and she holds me to it! There was never a better nor a harder-working wife, but she ain't what you'd call a patron of sport, and that's a fact."

"Sport!" cried the woman, bitterly. "A fine sport for you, Sir Charles, with your pleasant twenty-mile drive into the country, and your luncheon basket and your wines, and so merrily back to London in the cool of the evening, with a well-fought battle to talk over. Think of the sport that it was to me to sit through the long hours listening for the wheels of the chaise which would bring my man back to me. Sometimes he could walk in, and sometimes he was led in, and sometimes he was carried in, and it was only by his clothes that I could know him——"

"Come, wife," said the champion, patting her on the shoulders, "I've been cut up in my time, but never so bad as that."

"And then to live for weeks afterward with the fear that every knock at the door may be to tell us that the other is dead, and that my man may have to stand in the dock and take his trial for murder!"

"No, she hasn't got a sportin' drop in her veins," said Harrison. "She'd never make a patron, never! It's Black Baruk's business that did it, when we thought he'd napped it once too often. Well, she has my promise, and I'll never sling my hat over the ropes again unless she gives me leave."

"You'll keep your hat on your head like an honest, God-fearing man, John," said his wife, turning back into the house.

"I wouldn't for the world say anything to make you change your resolution," said my uncle. "At the same time, if you had wished to take a turn at the old sport, I had a good thing to put in your way."

"Well, it's no use, sir," said the smithy, "but I'd be glad to hear about it all the same."

"They have a very good bit of stuff at thirteen stone down Gloucester way. Wilson is his name, and they call him Crab on account of his style."

Harrison shook his head. "Never heard of him, sir."

"Very likely not, for he has never shown in the P. R. But they think great things of him in the west, and he can hold his own with either of the Belchers with the mufflers."

"Sparrin' ain't fightin'," said the champion.

“I am told that he had the best of it in a by battle with Noah James, of Cheshire.”

“There’s no gamer man on the list, sir, than Noah James, the guardsman,” said Harrison. “I saw him myself fight fifty rounds after his jaw had been cracked in three places. If Wilson could beat him, Wilson will go far.”

“So they think in the west, and they mean to spring him on the London talent. Sir Lothian Hume is his patron, and, to make a long story short, he lays me odds that I won’t find a young one of his weight to meet him. I told him that I had not heard of any good young ones, but that I had an old one who had not put his foot into a ring for many years, who would make his man wish he had never come to London. ‘Young or old, under twenty or over thirty-five, you may bring whom you will at the weight, and I shall lay two to one on Wilson,’ said he. I took him in thousands, and here I am.”

“It won’t do, Sir Charles,” said the smith, shaking his head. “There’s nothing would please me better, but you heard for yourself.”

“Well, if you won’t fight, Harrison, I must try to get some younger colt. I’d be glad of your advice in the matter. By the way, I take the chair at a supper of the Fancy at the Waggon and Horses in St. Martin’s Lane next Friday. I should be very glad if you would make one of my guests.—Hullo! who's this?" Up flew his glass to his eye.

Boy Jim had come out from the forge with his hammer in his hand. He had, I remember, a gray flannel shirt, which was open at the neck and turned up at the sleeves. My uncle ran his eyes over the fine lines of his magnificent figure with the glance of a connoisseur.

"That's my nephew, Sir Charles."

"Is he living with you?"

"His parents are dead."

"Has he ever been in London?"

"No, Sir Charles. He's been with me here since he was as high as that hammer."

My uncle turned to Boy Jim.

"I hear that you have never been in London," said he. "Your uncle is coming up to a supper which I am giving to the fancy next Friday. Would you care to make one of us?"

Boy Jim's dark eyes sparkled with pleasure.

"I should be glad to come, sir."

"No, no, Jim," cried the smith abruptly. "I'm sorry to gainsay you, lad, but there are reasons why I'd rather you staid down here with your aunt."

"Tut, Harrison, let the lad come!" cried my uncle.

“No, no, Sir Charles. It’s dangerous company for a lad of his mettle. There’s plenty for him to do when I’m away.”

Poor Jim turned away with a clouded brow and strode into the smithy again. For my part, I slipped after him to try to console him, and to tell him all the wonderful changes which had come so suddenly into my life. But I had not got half through my story, and Jim, like the good fellow that he was, had just begun to forget his own troubles in his delight at my good fortune, when my uncle called to me from without. The curricule with its tandem mares was waiting for us outside the cottage, and Ambrose had placed the refectory basket, the lapdog, and the precious toilet box inside of it. He had himself climbed up behind, and I, after a hearty handshake from my father and a last sobbing embrace from my mother, took my place beside my uncle. “Let go her head,” cried he to the hostler, and with a snap, a crack, and a jingle, away we went upon our journey.

Across all the years how clearly I can see that spring day with the green English fields, the windy English sky, and the yellow beetle-browed cottage in which I had grown from a child to a man! I see, too, the figures at the garden gate, my mother with her face turned away and her handkerchief waving, my father with his blue coat and his white shorts leaning upon his stick with his hand shading his eyes as he peered after us. All the village was out to see young Roddy Stone go off with his grand relative from London to call upon the prince in his own palace. The Harrisons were waving to me from the smithy, and John Cummings from the steps of the inn, and I saw Joshua Allen, my old schoolmaster, pointing me out to the people, as if he were showing what came from his teaching. To make it complete, who should drive past just as we cleared the village but Miss Hinton, the play-actress, the pony and phaeton, the same as when first I saw her, but she herself another woman, and I thought to myself that if Boy Jim had done nothing but that one thing he need not think that his youth had been wasted in the country.

She was driving to see him, I have no doubt, for they were closer than ever, and she never looked up nor saw the hand that I waved to her. So as we took the curve of the road the little village vanished, and there in the dip of the Downs, past the spires of Patchem and of Preston, lay the broad, blue sea and the gray houses of Brighton, with the strange eastern domes and minarets of the prince's pavilion shooting out from the centre of it. To every traveller it was a sight of beauty but to me it was the world, the great, wide, free world, and my heart thrilled and fluttered as the young bird's may when it first hears the whirr of its own flight and skims along with the blue heaven above it and the green fields beneath. The day may come when it may look back regretfully to the snug nest in the thorn brush; but what does it reckon of that when spring is in the air and youth in its blood, and the old hawk of trouble has not yet darkened the sunshine with the ill-boding shadow of its wings!

CHAPTER VII.

THE HOPE OF ENGLAND.

MY uncle drove for some time in silence, but I was conscious that his eye was always coming round to me, and I had an uneasy conviction that he was already beginning to ask himself whether he could make anything of me, or whether he had been betrayed into an indiscretion when he had allowed his sister to persuade him to show her son something of the grand world in which he lived.

“ You sing, don't you, nephew ? ” he asked, suddenly.

“ Yes, sir, a little.”

“ A barytone, I should fancy ? ”

“ Yes, sir.”

“ And your mother tells me that you play the fiddle. These things will be of service to you with the prince. Music runs in his family. Your education has been what you could get at a village school. Well, you are not examined in Greek roots in polite society, which is lucky for some of us. It is just as well to have a tag or two of Horace, or Virgil, 'Subtegmine fagi,' or 'habet fœnum in cornu,' which gives a flavour to one's conversation, like the touch of garlic in a salad. It is not bon ton to be learned, but it is a graceful thing to indicate that you have forgotten a good deal. Can you write verse?"

"I fear not, sir."

"A small book of rhymes may be had for half a crown. Vers de société are a great assistance to a young man. If you have the ladies on your side it does not matter whom you have against you. You must learn to open a door, to enter a room, to present a snuffbox, raising the lid with the forefinger of the hand in which you hold it. You must acquire the bow for a man, with its necessary touch of dignity, and that for a lady, which can not be too humble, and should still contain the least suspicion of abandon. You must cultivate a manner with women which shall be deprecating and yet audacious. Have you any eccentricity?"

It made me laugh, the easy way in which he asked the question, as if it were a most natural thing to possess.

"You have a pleasant catching laugh at all events," said he, "but an eccentricity is very bon ton at present, and if you feel any leaning toward one, I should certainly advise you to let it run its course. Peterham would have remained a mere peer all his life had it not come out that he had a snuffbox for every day in the year, and that he had caught cold through a mistake of his valet, who sent him out on a bitter winter day with a thin Sèvres china box instead of a thick tortoise-shell. That brought him out of the ruck, you see, and people remember him. Even some small characteristic, such as having an apricot tart on your sideboard all the year round, or putting your candle out at night by stuffing it under your pillow, serves to separate you from your neighbour. In my own case it is my precise judgment upon matters of dress and decorum which has placed me where I am. I do not profess to follow a law. I set one. For example, I am taking you to-day to see the prince in a nankeen vest. What do you think will be the consequence of that?"

My fears told me that it might be my own very great discomfiture, but I did not say so.

"Why, the night coach will carry the news to London. It will be in Brookes's and White's tomorrow morning. Within a week St. James Street and the Mall will be full of nankeen waistcoats. A most painful incident happened to me once. My cravat came undone in the street, and I actually walked from Carlton House to Watier's in Bruton Street with the two ends hanging loose. Do you suppose it shook my position? The same evening there were dozens of young bloods walking the streets of London with their cravats loose. If I had not rearranged mine there would not be one tied in the whole kingdom now, and a great art would have been prematurely lost. You have not yet begun to practise it."

I confessed that I had not.

"You should begin now in your youth. I will myself teach you the coup d'archet. By using a few hours in each day, which would otherwise be wasted, you may hope to have excellent cravats in middle life. The whole knack lies in pointing your chin to the sky, and then arranging your folds by the gradual descent of your lower jaw."

When my uncle spoke like this there was always that dancing, mischievous light in his large blue eyes which showed me that this humour of his was a conscious eccentricity, depending, as I believe, upon a natural fastidiousness of taste, but wilfully driven to grotesque lengths for the very reason which made him recommend me also to develop some peculiarity of my own. When I thought of the way in which he had spoken of his unhappy friend Lord Avon, upon the evening before, and of the emotion which he showed as he told the horrible story, I was glad to think that there was the heart of a man there, however much it might please him to conceal it.

And, as it happened, I was very soon to have another peep at it, for a most unexpected event befell us as we drew up in front of the Crown Hotel. A swarm of ostlers and grooms had rushed out to us, and my uncle, throwing down the reins, gathered Fidelio on his cushion from under the seat.

“Ambrose,” he cried, “you may take Fidelio.”

But there came no answer. The seat behind us was unoccupied. Ambrose was gone.

We could hardly believe our eyes when we alighted and found that it was really so. He had most certainly taken his seat there at Friar’s Oak, and from there on we had come without a break as fast as the mares could travel. Whither then could he have vanished to?

“He’s fallen off in a fit!” cried my uncle. “I’d drive back, but the prince is expecting us. Where’s the landlord?—Here, Coppinger, send your best man back to Friar’s Oak as fast as his horse can go, to find news of my valet, Ambrose. See that no pains be spared.—Now, nephew, we shall lunch and then go up to the Pavilion.”

My uncle was much disturbed by the strange loss of his valet, the more so as it was his custom to go through a whole series of washings and changings after even the shortest journey. For my own part, mindful of my mother's advice, I carefully brushed the dust from my clothes, and made myself as neat as possible. My heart was down in my boots now that I had the immediate prospect of meeting so great and terrible a person as the Prince of Wales. I had seen his flaring yellow barouche flying through Friar's Oak many a time, and had hallooed and waved my hat with the others as it passed, but never in my wildest dreams had it entered my head that I should ever be called upon to look him in the face and answer his questions. My mother had taught me to regard him with reverence, as one of those whom God had placed to rule over us, but my uncle astonished and shocked me by laughing when I told him how I felt.

"You are old enough to see things as they are, nephew," said he, "and your knowledge of them is the badge that you are in that inner circle where I mean to place you. There is no one who knows the prince better than I do, and there is no one who trusts him less. A stranger contradiction of qualities was never gathered under one hat. He is a man who is always in a hurry, and yet has never anything to do. He fusses about things with which he has no concern, and he neglects every obvious duty. He is generous to those who have no claim upon him, but he has ruined his tradesmen by refusing to pay his just debts. He is affectionate to casual acquaintances, but he dislikes his father, loathes his mother, and is not on speaking terms with his wife. He claims to be the first gentleman of England, but the gentlemen of England have responded by blackballing his friends at their clubs, and by warning him off from Newmarket, under suspicion of having tampered with a horse. He spends his days in uttering noble sentiments and contradicting them by ignoble actions. He tells stories of his own doings which are so grotesque that they can only be explained by the madness which runs in his blood.

“And yet, with all this, he can be courteous, and dignified, and kindly upon occasion, and I have seen an impulsive good-heartedness in the man which has made me overlook faults which come mainly from his being placed in a position which no man upon this earth was ever less fitted to fill. But this is between ourselves, nephew, and now you will come with me and you will form an opinion for yourself.”

It was but a short walk, and yet it took us some time, for my uncle stalked along with great dignity, his lace-bordered handkerchief in one hand, and his cane with the clouded amber head dangling from the other. Every one that we met seemed to know him, and their hats flew from their heads as we passed. He took little notice of these greetings, save to give a nod to one, or to slightly raise his forefinger to another. It chanced, however, that as we turned into the Pavilion grounds we met a magnificent team of four coal-black horses, driven by a rough-looking, middle-aged fellow in an old weather-stained cape. There was nothing that I could see to distinguish him from any professional driver, save that he was chatting very freely with a dainty little woman, who was perched on the box beside him.

“Hullo, Charlie! Good drive down?” he cried.

My uncle bowed and smiled to the lady.

“Broke it at Friar’s Oak,” said he. “I’ve my light curricule and two new mares, half-thoroughbred, half-Cleveland bay.”

“What d’ye think of my team of blacks?” cried the other.

“Yes, Sir Charles, what d’ye think of them? Ain’t they damnation smart?” said the little woman.

“Plenty of power. Good horses for the Sussex clay. Too thick about the fetlocks for me. I like to travel."

"Travel?" cried the woman, with extraordinary vehemence. "Why, what the——" and she broke into such language as I had never heard even from a man's lips before. "We'd start with our swingle-bars touching, and we'd have your dinner ordered, cooked, and laid before you were there to eat it."

"By God, yes; Letty is right!" cried the man. "D'you start to-morrow?"

"Yes, Jack."

"Well, I'll make you an offer. Look ye, here, Charlie. I'll spring my cattle from the Castle Square at quarter before nine. You can follow as the clock strikes. I've double the horses and double the weight. If you so much as see me before we cross Westminster bridge I'll pay you a cool hundred. If not, it's my money, play or pay. Is it a match?"

"Very good," said my uncle, and, raising his hat, he led the way into the grounds. As I followed I saw the woman take the reins, while the man looked after us, and squirted a jet of tobacco juice from between his teeth in coachman fashion.

"That's Sir John Lade," said my uncle, "one of the richest men and best whips in England.

There isn't a professional on the road that can handle either his tongue or his ribbons better, but his wife, Lady Letty, is his match with the one or the other."

"It was dreadful to hear her," said I.

"Oh, it's her eccentricity. We all have them, and she amuses the prince. Now, nephew, keep close at my elbow and have your eyes open and your mouth shut."

Two lines of magnificent red and gold footmen, who guarded the door, bowed deeply as my uncle and I passed between them, he with his head in the air and a manner as if he entered into his own, while I tried to look assured, though my heart was sinking within me. Within there was a high and large hall ornamented with Eastern decorations which corresponded with the domes and minarets of the exterior. A number of people were moving quickly about, forming into groups and whispering to each other. One of these, a short, burly, red-faced man, full of fuss and self-importance, came hurrying up to my uncle.

"I have de goot news, Sir Charles," he said, sinking his voice as one who speaks of weighty measures. "Es ist vollendet—dat is, I have it at last thoroughly done."

"Well, serve it hot," said my uncle, coldly,

“and see that the sauces are a little better than when last I dined at Carlton House.”

“ Ah, mine Gott! you tink I talk of cooking? It is the affair of the prince dat I talk of. Dat is one little vol-auvent dat is worth one hundred thousand pound. Ten per cent and double to be repaid when de royal pappa die. Alles ist fertig. Goldschmidt of de Hague have took it up, and the Dutch public has subscribe de money.”

“ Heaven help the Dutch public!” muttered my uncle, as the fat little man bustled off with his news to some newcomer. “ That’s the prince’s famous cook, nephew. He has not his equal in England for a filet sauté aux champignons. He manages his master’s money affairs.”

“ The cook!” I exclaimed, in bewilderment.

“ You look surprised, nephew.”

“ I should have thought that some respectable banking firm——”

My uncle inclined his lips to my ear.

“ No respectable house would touch them,” he whispered.—“ Ah, Mellish, is the prince within?”

“ In the private saloon, Sir Charles,” said the gentleman addressed.

“ Any one with him?”

“ Sheridan and Francis. He said he expected you.”

“Then we shall go through.”

I followed him through the strangest succession of rooms, full of curious barbaric splendour, which impressed me as being very rich and wonderful, though perhaps I should think differently now. Gold and scarlet, in arabesque designs, gleamed upon the walls, with gilt dragons and monsters writhing along cornices and out of corners. Finally, a footman opened a door, and we found ourselves in the prince's own private apartment.

Two gentlemen were lounging in a very easy fashion upon luxurious fauteuils at the farther end of the room, and a third stood between them, his thick, well-formed legs somewhat apart and his hands clasped behind him. The sun was shining in upon them through a side window, and I can see the three faces now—one in the dusk, one in the light, and one cut across by the shadow. Of those at the sides, I recall the reddish nose and dark flashing eyes of the one, and the hard, austere face of the other, with the high coat collars and many-wreathed cravats. These I took in at a glance, but it was upon the man in the centre that my gaze was fixed, for this I knew must be the Prince of Wales.

George was then in his forty-first year, and, with the help of his tailor and his hairdresser, he might have passed as somewhat less. The sight of him put me at my ease, for he was a merry-looking man, handsome, too, in a portly, full-blooded way, with laughing eyes and pouting, sensitive lips. His nose was turned upward, which increased the good-humoured effect of his countenance at the expense of its dignity. His cheeks were pale and sodden, like those of a man who lived too well and took too little exercise. He was dressed in a single-breasted black coat, buttoned up to his neck, a pair of leather pantaloons stretched tightly across his broad thighs, polished Hessian boots, and a huge white neck-cloth.

“Hullo, Tregellis!” he cried, in the cheeriest fashion, as my uncle crossed the threshold, and then suddenly the smile faded from his face, and his eyes gleamed with resentment. “What the devil is this?” he shouted, angrily.

A thrill of fear passed through me as I thought that it was my appearance which had produced this outburst. But his eyes were gazing past us, and, glancing round, we saw that a little man in a brown coat and scratch wig had followed so closely at our heels that the footmen had let him pass, under the impression that he was of our party. His face was very red, and the folded blue paper which he carried in his hand shook and crackled in his excitement.

“Why, it’s Vuillamy, the furniture man!” cried the prince. “Damme, am I to be dunned in my own private room? Where’s Mellish? Where’s Townshend? What the devil is Tom Tring doing?”

“I wouldn’t have intruded, your Royal Highness, but I must have the money—or even a thousand on account would do.”

“Must have it, must you, Vuillamy? That’s a fine word to use. I pay my debts in my own time, and damme I’m not to be bullied.—Turn him out, footman! Take him away!”

“If I don’t get it by Monday I shall be in your papa’s bench,” wailed the little man, and as the footman led him out we could hear him, amid shouts of laughter, still protesting that he would wind up in papa’s bench.

“That’s the very place for a furniture man,” said the man with the red nose.

“It should be the longest bench in the world, Sherry,” answered the prince, “for a good many of his subjects will want seats on it.—Very glad to see you back, Tregellis, but you must really be more careful what you bring in upon your skirts. It was only yesterday that we had a damned Dutchman here howling about some arrears of interest and the devil knows what. 'My good fellow,' said I, 'as long as the Commons starve me I have to starve you,' and so the matter ended."

"I think, sir, that the Commons would respond now if the matter were fairly put before them by Charlie Fox or myself," said Sheridan.

The prince burst out against the Commons with an energy of hatred that one would scarce expect from that chubby, good-humoured face.

"Why, damn them!" he cried. "After all their preaching and throwing my father's model life, as they called it, in my teeth, they had to pay his debts to the tune of nearly a million, while I can't get a hundred thousand out of them. And look at all they've done for my brothers! York is commander-in-chief. Clarence is admiral. What am I? Colonel of a damned dragoon regiment, under the orders of my own younger brother! It's my mother that is at the bottom of it all. She always tried to hold me back.—But what's this you've brought, Tregellis, eh?"

My uncle put his hand on my sleeve and led me forward.

"This is my sister's son, sir, Rodney Stone by name," said he. "He is coming with me to London, and I thought it right to begin by presenting him to your Royal Highness."

"Quite right! quite right!" said the prince, with a good-natured smile, patting me in a friendly way upon the shoulder. "Is your mother living?"

"Yes, sir," said I.

"If you are a good son to her, you will never go wrong. And, mark my words, Mr. Rodney Stone, you should honour the king, love your country, and uphold the glorious British constitution."

When I thought of the energy with which he had just been damning the House of Commons, I could scarce keep from smiling, and I saw Sheridan put his hand up to his lips.

"You have only to do this, to show a regard for your word, and to keep out of debt, in order to insure a happy and respected life. What is your father, Mr. Stone? Royal navy! Well, 'tis a glorious service. I have had a touch of it myself.—Did I ever tell how I laid aboard the French sloop of war Minerve—eh, Tregellis?"

"No, sir," said my uncle. Sheridan and Francis exchanged glances behind the prince's back.

"She was flying her tricolour out there within sight of my pavilion windows. Never saw such damned impudence in my life! It would take a man of less mettle than me to stand it. Out I went in my little cock boat—you know, my sixty-ton yawl, Charlie—with two four-pounders on each side and a six-pounder in the bows.”

“Well, sir! well, sir! and what then, sir?” cried Francis, who appeared to be an irascible, rough-tongued man.

“You will permit me to tell the story in my own way, Sir Philip,” said the prince with dignity. “I was about to say that our metal was so light, that I give you my word, gentlemen, I carried my port broadside in one coat pocket and my starboard in the other. Up we came to the big Frenchman, took her fire, and scraped the paint off her before we let drive. But it was no use. By God, gentlemen, our balls just stuck in her timbers like stones in a mud wall. She had her nettings up, but we scrambled aboard, and at it we went, hammer and anvil. It was a sharp twenty minutes, but we beat her people down below, made the hatches fast on them, and towed her into Seaham.—Surely, you were with us, Sherry?”

“I was in London at the time,” said Sheridan, gravely.

“You can vouch for it, Francis?”

“I can vouch to having heard your Highness tell the story.”

“It was a rough little bit of cutlass and pistol work. But for my own part I like the rapier.

It's a gentleman's weapon. You heard of my bout with the Chevalier d'Eon? I had him at my sword point for forty minutes at Angelo's. He is one of the best blades in Europe, but I was a little too supple in the wrist for him. 'I thank God there was a button on your Highness's foil,' said he, when we had finished our breather.—By the way, you're a bit of a duellist yourself, Tregellis! How often have you been out?"

"I used to go when I needed exercise," said my uncle, carelessly, "but I have taken to tennis now instead. A painful incident happened the last time that I was out, and it sickened me of it."

"You killed your man?"

"No, no, sir, it was worse than that. I had a coat that Weston has never equalled. To say that it fitted me is not to express it. It was me—like the hide on a horse. I've had sixty from him since, but he could never approach it. The sit of the collar brought tears into my eyes, sir, when first I saw it, and as to the waist——"

"But the duel, Tregellis!" cried the prince.

"Well, sir, I wore it at the duel, like the thoughtless fool that I was. It was Major Hunter of the Guards, with whom I had had a little tracasserie because I hinted that he should not come into Brooks's smelling of the stables. I fired first and missed. He fired, and I shrieked in despair. 'He's hit! A surgeon! a surgeon!' they cried. 'A tailor! a tailor!' said I; for there was a double hole through the tails of my masterpiece. No, it was past all repair. You may laugh, sir, but I'll never see the like of it again."

I had seated myself on a settee in the corner, upon the prince's invitation, and very glad I was to remain quiet and unnoticed, listening to the talk of these men. It was all in the same extravagant vein, garnished with many senseless oaths; but I observed this difference, that whereas my uncle and Sheridan had something of humour in their exaggeration, Francis tended always to ill-nature, and the prince to self-glorification. Finally, the conversation turned to music—I am not sure that my uncle did not artfully bring it there—and the prince, hearing from him of my tastes, would have it that I should then and there sit down at the wonderful little piano, all inlaid with mother-of-pearl, which stood in the corner, and play him the accompaniment to his song. It was called, as I remember, "The Briton Conquers but to Save," and he rolled it out in a very fair bass voice, the others joining in the chorus and clapping vigorously when he finished.

"Bravo, Mr. Stone!" said he. "You have an excellent touch, and I know what I am talking about when I speak of music; Cramer of the opera said only the other day that he had rather hand his baton to me than to any amateur in England.—Hullo, it's Charlie Fox, by all that's wonderful!"

He had run forward with much warmth and was shaking the hand of a singular-looking person who had just entered the room. The newcomer was a stout, square-built man, plainly and almost carelessly dressed, with an uncouth manner and a rolling gait. His age might have been something over fifty, and his swarthy, harshly featured face was already deeply lined either by his years or by his excesses. I have never seen a countenance in which the angel and the devil were more obviously wedded.

Above was the high, broad forehead of the philosopher, with keen, humorous eyes looking out from under thick, strong brows. Below was the heavy jowl of the sensualist, curving in a broad crease over his cravat. That brow was the brow of the public Charles Fox, the thinker, the philanthropist, the man who rallied and led the Liberal party during the twenty most hazardous years of its existence. That jaw was the jaw of the private Charles Fox, the gambler, the libertine, the drunkard. Yet to his sins he never added the crowning one of hypocrisy. His vices were as open as his virtues. In some quaint freak of Nature two spirits seemed to have been joined in one body, and the same frame to contain the best and the worst man of his age.

"I've run down from Chertsey, sir, just to shake you by the hand and to make sure that the Tories have not carried you off."

"Damnation, Charlie! you know that I sink or swim with my friends! A Whig I started, and a Whig I shall remain."

I thought that I could read upon Fox's dark face that he was by no means so confident about the prince's principles.

"Pitt has been at you, sir, I understand."

"Yes, confound him! I hate the sight of that damned sharp-pointed nose of his which he wants to be forever poking into my affairs. He and Addington have been boggling about the debts again. Why, look ye, Charlie, if Pitt held me in contempt he could not behave different."

I gathered from the smile which flittered over Sheridan's expressive face that this was exactly what Pitt did do. But straightway they all plunged into politics, varied by the drinking of sweet maraschino, which a footman brought round upon a salver. The king, the queen, the Lords and the Commons were each in succession cursed by the prince, in spite of the excellent advice which he had given me about the British constitution.

"Why, they allow me so little that I can't look after my own people. There are a dozen annuities to old servants and the like, and it's all I can do to scrape the money together to pay them. However, my"—he pulled himself up and coughed in a consequential way—"my financial agent has arranged for a loan, repayable upon the king's death. This liqueur isn't good for either of us, Charlie. We're both getting damned stout."

"I can't get my exercise, for the gout," said Fox.

"I am blooded fifty ounces a month, but the more I take the more I make.—You wouldn't think to look at us, Tregellis, that we could do what we have done.—We've had some days and nights together, Charlie."

Fox smiled and shook his head.

"You remember how we posted to Newmarket before the races. We took a public coach, Tregellis, clapped the postillions into the rumble, and jumped onto their places. Charlie rode the leader and I the wheeler. A damned fellow wouldn't let us through his turnpike, and Charlie hopped off and had his coat off in a minute. The fellow thought he had to do with a fighting man, and soon cleared the way for us."

“By the way, sir, speaking of fighting men, I give a supper to the fancy at the Wagon and Horses on Friday next,” said my uncle. “If you should chance to be in town they would think it a great honour if you should condescend to look in upon us.”

“I’ve not seen a fight since I saw Tom Tyne, the tailor, kill Earl fourteen years ago. I swore off then, and you know me as a man of my word, Tregellis. Of course, I’ve been at the ringside incog. many a time, but never as the Prince of Wales.”

“We should be vastly honoured if you would come incog. to our supper, sir.”

“Well, well, Sherry, make a note of it. We’ll be at Carlton House on Friday. The prince can’t come, you know, Tregellis, but you might reserve a chair for the Earl of Chester.”

“Sir, we shall be proud to see the Earl of Chester there,” said my uncle.

“By the way, Tregellis,” said Fox, “there’s some rumour about your having a sporting bet with Sir Lothian Hume. What’s the truth of it?”

“Only a small matter of a couple of thous to a thou, he giving the odds. He has a fancy to this new Gloucester man, Crab Wilson, and I’m to find a man to beat him. Anything under twenty or over thirty-five, at or about thirteen stone.”

“You take Charlie Fox’s advice, then,” cried the prince. “When it comes to handicapping a horse, playing a hand, matching a cock, or picking a man, he has the best judgment in England.—Now, Charlie, whom have we got upon the list who can beat Crab Wilson of Gloucester?”

I was amazed at the interest and knowledge which all these great people showed about the ring, for they not only had the deeds of the principal men of the time—Belcher, Mendoza, Jackson, or Dutch Sam—at their fingers’ ends, but there was no fighting man so obscure that they did not know the details of his deeds and prospects. The old ones and then the young were discussed, their weight, their gameness, their hitting power, and their constitution. Who, as he saw Sheridan and Fox eagerly arguing as to whether Caleb Baldwin, the Westminster costermonger, could hold his own with Isaac Bittoon the Jew, would have guessed that the one was the deepest political philosopher in Europe, and that the other would be remembered as the author of the wittiest comedy and of the finest speech of his generation? The name of Champion Harrison came very early into the discussion, and Fox, who had a high idea of Crab Wilson’s powers, was of the opinion that my uncle’s only chance lay in the veteran taking the field again. “He may be slow on his pins, but he fights with his head, and he hits like the kick of a horse. When he finished Black Baruk the man flew across the outer ring as well as the inner, and fell among the spectators. If he isn't absolutely stale, Tregellis, he is your best chance."

My uncle shrugged his shoulders.

"If poor Avon were here we might do something with him, for he was Harrison's first patron, and the man was devoted to him. But his wife is too strong for me. And now, sir, I must leave you, for I have had the misfortune to-day to lose the best valet in England, and I must make inquiry for him. I thank your Royal Highness for your kindness in receiving my nephew in so gracious a fashion."

"Till Friday, then," said the prince. "I have to go up to town in any case, for there is a poor devil of an East India Company's officer who has written to me in his distress. If I can raise a few hundreds I shall see him and set things right for him.—Now, Mr. Stone, you have your life before you, and I hope it will be one which your uncle may be proud of. You will honour the king and show respect for the constitution, Mr. Stone. And hark ye, you will avoid debt and bear in mind that your honour is a sacred thing." So I carried away a last impression of his plump, good-natured face, his high cravat, and his broad leather thighs. Again we passed the strange rooms, the gilded monsters, and the gorgeous footmen, and it was with relief that I found myself out in the open air once more, with the broad blue sea in front of us and the fresh evening breeze upon our faces.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE BRIGHTON ROAD.

MY uncle and I were up betimes next morning, but he was much out of temper, for no news had been heard of his valet Ambrose. He had, indeed, become like one of those ants of which I have read, who are so accustomed to be fed by smaller ants that when they are left to themselves they die of hunger. It was only by the aid of a man whom the landlord procured, and of Fox's valet, who had been sent expressly across, that his toilet was at last performed.

"I must win this race, nephew," said he, when we had finished breakfast. "I can't afford to be beat. Look out of the window and see if the Lades are there."

"I see a red four-in-hand in the square, and there is a crowd round it. Yes, I see the lady upon the box seat."

"Is our tandem out?"

"It is at the door."

“Come, then, and you shall have such a drive as you never had before.”

He stood at the door pulling on his long brown driving gauntlets and giving his orders to the ostlers.

“Every ounce will tell,” said he. “We’ll leave that dinner basket behind.—And you can keep my dog for me, Coppinger. You know him and understand him. Let him have his warm milk and curaçoa the same as usual.—Whoa, my darlings, you’ll have your fill of it before you see Westminster Bridge.”

“Shall I put in the toilet case?” asked the landlord.

I saw the struggle upon my uncle’s face, but he was true to his principles.

“Put it under the seat—the front seat,” said he.—“Nephew, you must keep your weight as far forward as possible. Can you do anything on a yard of tin? Well, if you can’t, we’ll leave the trumpet.—Buckle that girth up, Thomas. Have you greased the hubs as I told you? Well, jump up, nephew, and we’ll see them off.”

Quite a crowd had gathered in the old square, men and women, dark-coated tradesmen, bucks from the prince’s court, and officers from Hove, all in a buzz of excitement, for Sir John Lade and my uncle were two of the most famous whips of the time, and a match between them was a thing to talk of for many a long day.

“The prince will be sorry to have missed the start,” said my uncle. “He doesn’t show before midday.—Ah, Jack, good morning!—Your servant, madame! It’s a fine day for a little bit of wag-goning.”

As our tandem came alongside of the four-in-hand, with the two bonny mares gleaming like shot silk in the sunshine, a murmur of admiration arose from the crowd. My uncle, in his fawn-coloured driving coat, with all his harness of the same tint, looked the ideal Corinthian whip, while Sir John Lade, with his many-capped coat, his white hat, and his rough, weatherbeaten face, might have taken his seat with a line of professionals upon an alehouse bench without any one being able to pick him out as one of the wealthiest landowners in England.

It was an age of eccentricity, but he had carried his peculiarities to a length which surprised even the out-and-outers by marrying the mistress of a famous highwayman when the gallows had come between her and her lover. She was perched by his side, looking very smart in the flowered bonnet and a gray travelling dress, while in front of them the four splendid coal-black horses, with a flickering touch of gold upon their powerful, well-curved quarters, were pawing the stones in their eagerness to be off.

“It’s a hundred that you don’t see us before Westminster with a quarter of an hour’s start,” said Sir John.

“I’ll take you another hundred that we pass you,” answered my uncle.

“Very good. Time’s up. Good-bye!” He gave a tchk of the tongue, shook his reins, saluted with his whip in true coachman’s style, and away he went, taking the curve out of the square in a workmanlike fashion that fetched a cheer from the crowd. We heard the dwindling roar of his wheels upon the cobblestones until they died away in the distance.

It seemed one of the longest quarters of an hour that I had ever known before the first stroke of nine boomed from the parish clock. For my part I was fidgeting in my seat in my impatience, but my uncle’s calm, pale face and large blue eyes were as tranquil and demure as those of the most unconcerned spectator. He was keenly on the alert, however, and it seemed to me that the stroke of the clock and the thong of his whip fell together—not in a blow, but in a sharp snap over them both, which sent us flying with a jingle and a rattle upon our fifty-mile journey. I heard a roar from behind us, saw the lines of windows with staring faces and waving handkerchiefs, and then we were off the stones and on to the good white road, which curved away in front of us with the sweep of the green Downs on either side of it.

I had been provided with shillings, that the turnpike gate might not stop us, but my uncle reined in the mares, and took them at a very easy trot up all the heavy stretch which ends in Clayton hill. He let them go then, and we flashed through Friar's Oak and across St. John's Common without more than catching a glimpse of the yellow cottage which contained all that I loved best. Never have I travelled at such a pace, and never have I felt such a sense of exhilaration from the rush of keen upland air upon our faces, and from the sight of those two glorious creatures, stretched to their uttermost, with the roar of their hoofs and the rattle of our wheels as the light curricule bounded and swayed behind them.

"It's a long four miles uphill from here to Hand Cross," said my uncle, as we flew through Cuckfield. "I must ease them a bit, for I can not afford to break the hearts of my cattle. They have the right blood in them, and they would gallop until they dropped if I were brute enough to let them. Stand up on the seat, nephew, and see if you can get a glimpse of them."

I stood up, steadying myself upon my uncle's shoulder, but, though I could see for a mile, or perhaps a quarter more, there was not a sign of the four-in-hand.

"If he has sprung his cattle up all these hills they'll be spent ere they see Croydon," said he.

"They have four to two," said I.

"J'en suis bien aise. The Cleveland bay strain makes a good, honest creature, but not fliers like these. There lies Cuckfield Place, where the Towers are, yonder. Get your weight right forward on the splashboard, now that we are going uphill, nephew. Look at the action of that leader. Did you ever see anything more easy and more beautiful?"

We were taking the hill at a quiet trot, but even so we made the carrier, walking in the shadow of his huge broad-wheeled canvas-covered wagon, stare at us in amazement. Close to Hand-cross we passed the Royal Brighton stage, which had left at half past seven, dragging heavily up the slope, and its passengers toiling along in the dust behind us, gave us a cheer as we whirled by. At Hand-cross we caught a glimpse of the old landlord, hurrying out with his gin and gingerbread, but the dip of the ground was downward now, and away we flew as fast as eight gallant hoofs could take us.

"Do you drive, nephew?"

"Very little, sir."

"There is no driving on the Brighton road."

"How is that, sir?"

"Too good a road, nephew. I have only to give them their heads, and they will race me into Westminster. It wasn't always so. When I was a very young man one might learn to handle his twenty yards of tape here as well as elsewhere. There's not much really good wagoning now south of Leicestershire. Show me a man who can hit 'em and hold 'em on a Yorkshire daleside, and that's the man who comes from the right school."

We had raced over Crawley Down and into the broad main street of Crawley village, flying between two country wagons in a way which showed me that even now a driver might do something on the road. With every turn I peered ahead, looking for our opponents, but my uncle seemed to concern himself very little about them, and occupied himself in giving me advice mixed up with so many phrases of the craft that it was all I could do to follow him.

"Keep a finger for each or you will have your reins clubbed," said he. "As to the whip, the less fanning the better, if you have willing cattle, but when you want to put a little life into a coach, see that you get your thong onto the one that needs it, and don't let it fly round after you've hit. I've seen a driver warm up the off-side passenger on the roof behind him every time he tried to cut his off-side wheeler. I believe that is their dust over yonder."

A long stretch of road lay before us, barred with the shadows of wayside trees. Through the green fields a lazy blue river was drawing itself slowly along, passing under a bridge in front of us. Beyond was a young fir plantation, and over its olive line there rose a white whirl which drifted swiftly like a cloud scud on a breezy day.

"Yes, yes; it's they!" cried my uncle. "No one else would travel as fast. Come, nephew, we're halfway when we cross the Mole at Kimberham Bridge, and we've done it in two hours and fourteen minutes. The prince drove to Carlton House with a three tandem in four hours and a half. The first half is the worst half, and we might cut his time if all goes well. We should make up between this and Reigate."

And we flew. The bay mares seemed to know what that white puff in front of us signified and they stretched themselves like greyhounds. We passed a phaeton and pair London-bound and we left it behind as if it had been standing still. Trees, gates, cottages went dancing by. We heard the folks shouting from the field under the impression that we were a runaway. Faster and faster yet they raced, the hoofs rattling like castanets, the yellow manes flying, the wheels buzzing and every joint and rivet creaking and groaning, while the curricie swung and swayed until I found myself clutching at the side rail. My uncle eased them and glanced at his watch as we saw the gray tiles and dingy red houses of Reigate in the hollow beneath us.

“We did the last six well under twenty minutes,” said he. “We’ve time in hand now, and a little water at the Red Lion will do them no harm.—Red four-in-hand passed, ostler?”

“Galloping full split, sir! Took the wheel off a butcher’s cart at the corner of the High Street, and was out o’ sight before the butcher’s boy could see what had hurt him.”

Z-z-z-z-ach! went the long thong, and away we flew once more. It was market day at Redhill, and the road was crowded with carts of produce, droves of bullocks, and farmers’ gigs. It was a sight to see how my uncle threaded his way among them all. Through the market place we dashed amid the shouting of men, the screaming of women, and the scuttling of poultry, and then we were out in the country again, with the long, steep incline of the Redhill road before us. My uncle waved his whip in the air with a shrill view-halloo.

There was the dust cloud, rolling up the hill in front of us, and through it we had a shadowy peep of the backs of our opponents, with a flash of brasswork and gleam of scarlet.

"There's half the game won, nephew. Now we must pass them.—Hark forward, my beauties! —By George, if Kitty isn't foundered!"

The leader had suddenly gone dead lame. In an instant we were both out of the curricle and on our knees beside her. It was but a stone, wedged between frog and shoe in the off fore-foot, but it was a minute or two before we could wrench it out. When we had regained our places the Lades were round the curve of the hill and out of sight.

"Bad luck," growled my uncle. "But they can't get away from us!" For the first time he touched the mares up, for he had but cracked the whip over their heads before. "If we catch them in the next few miles we can spare them for the rest of the way."

They were beginning to show signs of exhaustion. Their breath came quick and hoarse, and their beautiful coats gleamed with moisture.

At the top of the hill, however, they settled down into their swing once more.

“Where on earth have they got to?” cried my uncle. “Can you make them out on the road, nephew?”

We could see a long, white ribbon of it, all dotted with carts and wagons coming from Croydon to Redhill, but there was no sign of the big red four-in-hand.

“There they are! Stole away! Stole away!” he cried, wheeling the mares round into a side road, which struck to the right out of that which we had travelled. “There you are, nephew! On the brow of the hill!”

Sure enough, on the rise of a curve upon our right the four-in-hand had appeared, the horses stretched to the utmost. Our mares laid themselves out gallantly, and the distance between us began slowly to decrease. I found that I could see the black band upon Sir John’s white hat, then that I could count the folds of his cape, finally that I could see the pretty features of his wife as she looked back at us.

“We’re on the side road to Godstone and Warlingham,” said my uncle. “I suppose he thought that he could make better time by getting out of the way of the market carts. But we’ve got the devil of a hill to come down.

You'll see some fun, nephew, or I am mistaken."

As he spoke I suddenly saw the wheels of the four-in-hand disappear, then the body of it, and then the two figures upon the box, as suddenly and abruptly as if it had bumped down the first three steps of some gigantic stairs. An instant later we had reached the same spot, and there was the road beneath us, steep and narrow, winding in long curves into the valley. The four-in-hand was swishing down it as hard as the horses could gallop.

"Thought so," cried my uncle. "If he doesn't brake why should I?—Now, my darlings, one good spurt and we'll show them the colour of our tailboard."

We shot over the brow and flew madly down the hill with the great, red coach roaring and thundering before us. Already we were in her dust, so that we could see nothing but the dim scarlet blur in the heart of it, rocking and rolling, with its outline hardening at every stride. We could hear the crack of the whip in front of us and the shrill voice of Lady Lade as she screamed to the horses. My uncle was very quiet, but when I glanced up at him I saw that his lips were set and his eyes shining, with just a little flush upon each pale cheek. There was no need to urge on the mares, for they were already flying at a pace which could neither be stopped nor controlled. Our leaders had come abreast of the near hind wheel, then of the near front one—for a hundred yards we did not gain an inch—and then with a spurt the bay leader was neck to neck with the black wheeler, and our fore wheel within an inch of their hind one.

“Dusty work!” said my uncle quietly.

“Fan ’em, Jack, fan ’em!” shrieked the lady.

Sir John sprang up and lashed at his horses.

“Look out, Tregellis!” he shouted. “There’s a damnation spill coming for somebody!”

We had got fairly abreast of them now, the rumps of the horses exactly align, and the fore wheels whizzing together. There was not six inches to spare in the breadth of the road, and every instant I expected to feel the jar of a locking wheel. But now, as we came out from the dust, we could see what was ahead, and my uncle whistled between his teeth at the sight.

Two hundred yards or so in front of us there was a bridge with wooden posts and rails upon either side. The road narrowed down at the point so that it was obvious that the two carriages abreast could not possibly get over. One must give way to the other. Already our wheels were abreast of their wheelers.

"I lead!" shouted my uncle. "You must pull them, Lade!"

"Not I!" he roared.

"No, by God!" shrieked her ladyship.—"Fan 'em, Jack. Keep on fanning 'em!"

It seemed to me that we were all going to eternity together. But my uncle did the only thing that could have saved us. By a desperate effort we might just clear the other coach before reaching the mouth of the bridge. He sprang up and lashed right and left at the mares, who, maddened by the unaccustomed pain, hurled themselves on in a frenzy. Down we thundered together, all shouting I believe at the top of our voices in the madness of the moment, but still we were drawing steadily away, and we were almost clear of the leaders, when we flew onto the bridge. I glanced back at the coach, and I saw Lady Lade, with her savage little white teeth clinched together, throw herself forward and tug with both hands at the near-side reins.

"Jam them, Jack!" she cried. "Jam the — before they can pass!"

Had she done it an instant sooner we should have crashed against the woodwork, carried it away, and been hurled into the deep gully below. As it was, it was not the powerful haunch of the black wheeler which caught us, but the forequarter of the leader, which had not weight enough to turn us from our course. I saw a wet red seam gape suddenly through the black hair, and next instant we were flying alone down the road, while the four-in-hand had halted, and Sir John and his lady were down in the road together tending to the wounded horse.

“Easy, now, my beauties!” cried my uncle, settling down into his seat again and looking back over his shoulder. “I could not have believed that Sir John Lade would have been guilty of such a trick as pulling that leader across. I do not permit a mauvaise plaisanterie of that sort. He shall hear from me to-night.”

“It was the lady,” said I. My uncle’s brow cleared, and he began to laugh.

“It was little Letty, was it?” said he. “I might have known it. There’s a touch of the late lamented sixteen-string-Jack about the trick. Well, it is only messages of another kind that I send to a lady, so we’ll just drive on our way, nephew, and thank our stars that we bring whole bones over the Thames.”

We stopped at the Greyhound at Croydon, where the two good little mares were sponged and petted and fed, after which, at an easier pace, we made our way through Norbury and Streatham. At last the fields grew fewer and the walls longer, the outlying villas closed up thicker and thicker, until their shoulders met, and we were driving between a double line of houses with garish shops at the corners, and such a stream of traffic as I had never seen roaring down the centre. Then suddenly we were on a broad bridge with a dark brown river flowing sulkily beneath it, and bluff-bowed barges drifting down upon its bosom. To the right and left stretched a broken, irregular line of many-coloured houses winding along either bank as far as I could see.

“That’s the House of Parliament, nephew,” said my uncle, pointing with his whip, “and the black towers are Westminster Abbey.—How do, your Grace? How do?—That’s the Duke of Norfolk, the stout man in blue upon the swish-tailed mare. Now we are in Whitehall. There’s the Treasury on the left, and the Horse Guards and the Admiralty, where the stone dolphins are carved above the gate.”

I had the idea, which a country-bred lad brings up with him, that London was merely a wilderness of houses, but I was astonished now to see the green slopes and the lovely spring trees showing between.

“Yes, those are the Privy Gardens,” said my uncle, “and there is the window out of which Charles took his last step onto the scaffold. You wouldn't think the mares had come fifty miles, would you? See how les petites chéries step out for the credit of their master! Look at the barouche with the sharp-featured man peeping out of the window. That's Pitt, going down to the House. We are coming into Pall Mall now, and this great building on the left is Carlton House, the prince's palace. There's St. James's, the big dingy palace with the clock and the two red-coated sentries before it. And here's the famous street of the same name, nephew, which is the very centre of the world; and here's Jermyn Street opening out of it; and finally here's my own little box, and we are well under the five hours from Brighton Old Square."

WATIER'S.

MY uncle's house in Jermyn Street was quite a small one—five rooms and an attic. "A man cook and a cottage," he said, "are all that a philosopher requires." On the other hand, it was furnished with the neatness and taste which belonged to his character, so that his most luxurious friends found something in the tiny rooms which made them discontented with their own sumptuous mansions. Even the attic, which had been converted into my bedroom, was the most perfect little bijou attic that could possibly be imagined. Beautiful and valuable knickknacks filled every corner of every apartment, so that the house had become a perfect miniature museum, which would have delighted a virtuoso. My uncle explained the presence of all these pretty things with a shrug of his shoulders and a wave of his hands. "They are des petites cadeaux," said he, "but it would be an indiscretion for me to say more."

We found a note from Ambrose waiting for us which increased rather than explained the mystery of his disappearance.

“My dear Sir Charles Tregellis,” it ran, “it will ever be a subject of regret to me that the force of circumstances should have compelled me to leave your service in so abrupt a fashion, but something occurred during our journey from Friar’s Oak to Brighton which left me without any possible alternative. I trust, however, that my absence may prove to be merely a temporary one. The isinglass recipe for the shirt fronts is in the strong room at Drummond’s Bank. Yours obediently, AMBROSE.”

“Well, I suppose I must fill his place as best I can,” said my uncle, moodily. “But how on earth could something have occurred to make him leave me at a time when we were going full trot downhill in my curricule? I shall never find his match again, either for chocolate or cravats. Je suis desolé! But now, nephew, we must send to Weston and have you fitted up. It is not for a gentleman to go to a shop, but for the shop to come to the gentleman. Until you have your clothes you must remain en retraite.”

The measuring was a most solemn and serious function, though it was nothing to the trying on two days later, when my uncle stood by in an agony of apprehension as each garment was adjusted, he and Weston arguing over every seam and lappel and skirt until I was dizzy with turning round in front of them. Then just as I had hoped that all was settled in came young Mr. Brummel, who promised to be an even greater exquisite than my uncle, and the whole matter had to be thrashed out between them. He was a good-sized man, this Brummel, with a long, fair face, light brown hair and sandy side-whiskers. His manner was languid, his voice drawling, and, while he eclipsed my uncle in the extravagance of his speech, he had not the same air of manliness and decision which underlay all my uncle's affectations.

"Why, George," cried my uncle, "I thought you were with your regiment?"

"I've sent in my papers," drawled the other.

"I thought it would come to that."

"Yes. The Tenth was ordered to Manchester, and they could hardly expect me to go to a place like that. Besides, I found the 'major damned rude."

"How was that?"

"He expected me to know all about his infernal drill, Tregellis, and I had other things to think of, as you may suppose. I had no difficulty in taking my right place in parade, for there was a trooper with a red nose on a flea-bitten gray, and I had observed that my post was always immediately in front of him. This saved a great deal of trouble. The other day, however, when I came on parade, I galloped up one line and down the other, but the devil a glimpse could I get of that long nose of his! Then, just as I was at my wits' end, I caught sight of him, all alone at one side, so I formed up in front. It seems he had been put there to keep the ground, and the major so far forgot himself as to say that I knew nothing of my duties."

My uncle laughed, and Brummel looked me up and down with his large, intolerant eyes.

"These will do very passably," said he. "Buff and blue are always very gentlemanlike. But a sprigged waistcoat would have been better."

"I think not," said my uncle, warmly.

"My dear Tregellis, you are infallible upon a cravat, but you must allow me the right of my own judgment upon vests. I like it vastly as it stands, but a touch of red sprig would give it the finish that it needs."

They argued, with many examples and analogies, for a good ten minutes, revolving around me at the same time, with their heads on one side and their glasses to their eyes. It was a relief to me when they at last agreed upon a compromise.

"You must not let anything that I have said shake your faith in Sir Charles's judgment, Mr. Stone," said Brummel, very earnestly.

I assured him that I should not.

"If you were my nephew I should expect you to follow my taste. But you will cut a very good figure as it is. I had a young cousin who came up to town last year with a recommendation to my care. But he would take no advice. At the end of the second week I met him coming down St. James Street in a snuff-coloured coat, cut by a country tailor. He bowed to me. Of course I knew what was due to myself. I looked all round him and there was an end to his career in town. You are from the country, Mr. Stone?"

"From Sussex, sir."

"Sussex! Why, that's where I send my washing to. There is an excellent clear-starcher living near Haywards Heath. I send my shirts two at a time, for if you send more it excites the woman and diverts her attention. I can not abide anything but country-washing. But I should be vastly sorry to have to live there. What can a man find to do?"

"You don't hunt, George?"

"When I do it's a woman. But surely you don't go to hounds, Charles?"

"I was out with the Belvoir last winter."

"What amusement can there be in flying about among a crowd of greasy, galloping farmers? Every man to his own taste, but Brookes's window by day and a snug corner at the macao table at Watier's by night give me all I want for mind and body. You heard how I plucked Montague the brewer!"

"I have been out of town."

"I had eight thousand from him at a sitting. 'I shall drink your beer in future, Mr. Brewer,' said I. 'Every blackguard in London does,' said he. It was monstrous impolite of him, but some people can not lose with grace. Well, I am going down to Clarges Street to pay Jew King a little of my interest. Are you bound that way? Well, good-bye, then! I'll see you and your young friend at the club or in the Mall, no doubt," and he sauntered off upon his way.

"That young man is destined to take my place," said my uncle, gravely, when Brummel had departed. "He is quite young and of no descent, but he has made his way by his cool effrontery, by his natural taste, and by his extravagance of speech. There is no man who can be impolite in so polished a fashion. Already his opinion is quoted in the clubs as a rival to my own. Well, every man has his day, and when I am convinced that mine is past, St. James Street will know me no more, for it is not in my nature to be second to any man. But now, nephew, in that buff and blue suit you may pass anywhere, so if you please we will step into my vis-à-vis and I will show you something of the town."

How can I describe all that we saw and all that we did upon that lovely spring day! To me it was as if I had been wafted to a fairy world, and my uncle might have been some benevolent enchanter in a high-collared, long-tailed coat who was guiding me about in it. He showed me the West End streets with the bright carriages and the gayly dressed ladies and sombre-clad men, all crossing and hurrying and recrossing, like an ants' nest when you turn it over with a stick. Never had I formed a conception of such endless banks of houses, and such a ceaseless stream of life flowing between. Then we passed down the Strand, where the crowd was thicker than ever, and even penetrated beyond Temple Bar and into the City, though my uncle begged me not to mention it for he would not wish it to be generally known. There I saw the Exchange and the Bank and Lloyd's Coffee-house with the brown-coated, sharp-faced merchants and the hurrying clerks, the huge horses and the busy draymen.

It was a very different world, this, from that which we had left in the west—a world of energy and of strength, where there was no place for the listless and the idle. Young as I was, I knew that it was here, in the forest of merchant shipping, in the bales which swung up to the warehouse windows, in the loaded wagons which roared over the cobblestones, that the power of Britain lay. Here in the City of London was the tap-root from which empire and wealth and so many other fine leaves had sprouted. Fashion and speech and manners may change, and the city bells may ring out the hours until the clappers fall from their hinges, but the spirit of enterprise within that square mile or two of land must not change, for when it withers all that has grown from it must wither also.

We lunched at Stephen's, the fashionable inn in Bond Street, where I saw a line of Tilburys and saddle horses which stretched from the door to the farther end of the street. And thence we went to the Mall in St. James's Park, and thence to Brooks's, the great Whig club, and thence again to Watier's, where the men of fashion used to gamble. Everywhere I met the same sort of men with their stiff figures and small waists, all showing the utmost deference to my uncle, and, for his sake, every civility to me. The talk was always such as I had already heard at the Pavilion—talk of politics, talk of the king's health, talk of the prince's extravagance, of the expected renewal of the war, of horse racing, and of the ring. I saw, too, that eccentricity was, as my uncle had told me, the fashion, and if the folk upon the continent look upon us even to this day as being a nation of lunatics, it is no doubt a tradition handed down from the time when the only travellers whom they were likely to see were drawn from the class which I was now meeting.

It was an age of heroism and of folly. On the one hand, sailors and statesmen of the quality of Pitt, Nelson, and afterward Wellington, had been forced to the front by the imminent menace of Bonaparte. We were great in arms, and were soon also to be great in literature, for Scott and Byron were in their day the strongest forces in Europe. On the other hand, a touch of madness, real or assumed, was a passport through doors which were closed to wisdom and to virtue. The man who could enter a drawing room walking upon his hands, the man who had filed his teeth that he might whistle like a coachman, the man who always spoke his thoughts aloud and so kept his guests in a quiver of apprehension, these were the people who found it easy to come to the front in London society. Nor could the heroism and the folly be kept apart, for there were few who could quite escape the contagion of the times. In an age when the premier was a heavy drinker, the leader of the opposition a libertine, and the Prince of Wales a combination of the two, it was hard to know where to look for a man whose private and public characters were equally lofty. At the same time, with all its faults, it was a strong age, and you will be fortunate if in your time the one island produces five such names as Pitt, Fox, Scott, Nelson, and Wellington.

It was in Watier's that night seated by my uncle on one of the red velvet settees at the side of the room that I had pointed out to me some of those singular characters whose fame and eccentricities are even now not wholly forgotten in the world. The long, many-pillared room, with its mirrors and chandeliers, was crowded with full-blooded, loud-voiced men about town, all in the same evening dress of white silk stockings, cambric shirt fronts, and little flat chapeau bras under the arm.

"The acid-faced old gentleman with the thin legs is the Marquis of Queensberry," said my uncle. "His chaise was driven nineteen miles in an hour in a match against the Count Taafe, and he sent a message fifty miles in thirty minutes by throwing it from hand to hand in a cricket ball. The man he is talking to is Sir Charles Bunbury of the Jockey Club, who had the prince warned off the Heath at Newmarket on account of the in-and-out riding of Sam Chifney, his jockey. There's Captain Barclay going up to them now. He knows more about training than any man alive, and he has walked ninety miles in twenty-one hours. You have only to look at his calves to see that Nature built him for it. There's another walker there, the man with the flowered vest standing near the fireplace. That is Buck Whalley, who walked to Jerusalem in a long blue coat, top-boots, and buckskins."

"Why did he do that, sir?" I asked, in astonishment.

My uncle shrugged his shoulders.

"It was his humour," said he. "He walked into society through it, and that was better worth reaching than Jerusalem. There's Lord Peter-sham, the man with the beaky nose. He always rises at six in the evening, and he owns the finest cellar of snuff in Europe. He's talking to Lord Panmure, who can take his six bottles of claret and argue with a bishop after it.—Evening, Dudley!"

"Evening, Tregellis!" An elderly, vacant-looking man had stopped before us and was looking me up and down. "Some young cub Charlie Tregellis has caught in the country," he murmured. "He doesn't look as if he would be much credit to him.—Been out of town, Tregellis?"

"For a few days."

"Hem!" said the man, transferring his sleepy gaze to my uncle. "He's looking pretty bad. He'll be going into the country feet foremost some of these days if he doesn't pull up!" He nodded, and passed on.

"You mustn't look so mortified, nephew," said my uncle, laughing. "That's old Lord Dudley, and he has a trick of thinking aloud. People used to be offended, but they take no notice of him now. It was only last week, when he was dining at Lord Elgin's, that he apologized to the company for the shocking bad cooking. He thought he was at his own table, you see. It gives him a place of his own in society. That's Lord Harewood he has fastened onto now. Harewood's peculiarity is to mimic the prince in everything. One day the prince hid his queue behind the collar of his coat, so Harewood cut his off, thinking that they were going out of fashion. Here's Lumley, the ugly man. 'L'homme laid' they called him in Paris. The other one is Lord Foley—they call him No. 11, on account of his thin legs."

"There is Mr. Brummel, sir," said I.

"Yes, he'll come to us presently. That young man has certainly a future before him. Do you observe the way in which he looks round the room from under his drooping eyelids, as though it were a condescension that he should have entered it? Small conceits are intolerable, but when they are pushed to the uttermost they become respectable.—How do, George?"

"Have you heard about Vereker Merton?" asked Brummel, strolling up with one or two other exquisites at his heels. "He has run away with his father's woman cook, and actually married her!"

"What did Lord Merton do?"

"He congratulated him warmly, and confessed that he had always underrated his intelligence. He is to live with the young couple, and make a handsome allowance, on condition that the bride sticks to her old duties. By the way, there was a rumour that you were about to marry, Tregellis?"

"I think not," answered my uncle. "It would be a mistake to overwhelm one by attentions which are a pleasure to many."

"My view exactly, and very neatly expressed," cried Brummel. "Is it fair to break a dozen hearts in order to intoxicate one with rapture? I'm off to the continent next week."

"Bailiffs?" asked one of his companions.

"Too bad, Pierrepont. No, no, it is pleasure and instruction combined. Besides, it is necessary to go to Paris for your little things, and if there is a chance of war breaking out again it would be well to lay in a supply."

"Quite right," said my uncle, who seemed to have made up his mind to outdo Brummel in extravagance. "I used to get my sulphur-coloured gloves from the Palace Royal. When the war broke out in '93 I was cut off from them for nine years. Had it not been for a lugger, which I specially hired to smuggle them, I might have been reduced to English tan."

"The English are excellent at a flatiron or a kitchen poker," said Brummel, "but anything more delicate is beyond them."

"Our tailors are good," cried my uncle, "but our stuffs lack taste and variety. The war has made us more rococo than ever. It has cut us off from travel, and there is nothing like travel for expanding the mind. Last year, for example, I came upon some new waistcoating in the square of San Marco at Venice. It was yellow, with the prettiest little twill of pink running through it. How could I have seen it had I not travelled! I brought it back with me, and for a time it was all the rage."

"The prince took it up."

"Yes, he usually follows my lead. We dressed so alike last year that we were frequently mistaken for each other. It tells against me, but so it was. He often complains that things do not look as well upon him as upon me, but how can I make the obvious reply? By the way, George, I did not see you at the Marchioness of Dover's ball."

"Yes, I was there, and lingered for a quarter of an hour or so. I am surprised that you did not see me. I did not go past the doorway, however, for undue preference gives rise to jealousy."

"I went early," said my uncle, "for I had heard that there were to be some tolerable débutantes. It always pleases me vastly when I am able to pass a compliment to any of them. It has happened, but not often, for I keep to my own standard."

So they talked, these singular men, and I, looking from one to the other, could not imagine how they could help bursting out a-laughing in each other's faces. But, on the contrary, their conversation was very grave and filled out with many little bows, and opening and shutting of snuffboxes and flickings of laced handkerchiefs.

Quite a crowd had gathered silently round, and I could see that the talk had been regarded as a contest between two men who were looked upon as rival arbiters of fashion. It was finished by the Duke of Queensberry passing his arm through Brummel's and leading him off, while my uncle threw out his laced cambric shirt front and shot his ruffles as if he were well satisfied with his share in the encounter. It is seven and forty years since I looked upon that circle of dandies, and where now are their dainty little hats, their wonderful waistcoats, and their boots in which one could arrange one's cravat? They lived strange lives, these men, and died strange deaths, some by their own hands, some as beggars, some in a debtor's jail, some, like the most brilliant of them all, in a madhouse in a foreign land.

"There is the card room, Rodney," said my uncle, as we passed an open door on our way out. Glancing in I saw a line of little green baize tables, with small groups of men sitting round, while at one side was a longer one from which there came a continuous murmur of voices. "You may lose what you like in there save only your nerve or your temper," my uncle continued.— Ah, Sir Lothian, I trust that luck was with you."

A tall, thin man, with a hard, austere face had stepped out of the open doorway. His heavily thatched eyebrows covered quick little gray eyes, and his gaunt features were hollowed at the cheek and temple like water-grooved flint. He was dressed entirely in black, and I noticed that his shoulder swayed a little as if he had been drinking. "Lost like the devil!" he snapped.

"Dice?"

"No; whist."

"You couldn't get very hard hit over that!"

"Couldn't you?" he snarled. "Play a hundred a trick and a thousand on the rub and lose steadily for five hours, and see what you think of it."

My uncle was evidently struck by the haggard look on the other's face.

"I hope it's not very bad," he said.

"Bad enough. It won't bear talking about. By the way, Tregellis, have you got your man for this fight yet?"

"No."

"You seem to be hanging in the wind a long time. It's play or pay, you know. I shall claim forfeit if you don't come to the scratch."

“If you will name your day, I shall produce my man, Sir Lothian,” said my uncle coldly.

“This day four weeks if you like.”

“Very good. Eighteenth of May.”

“I hope to have changed my name by then.”

“How is that?” asked my uncle, in surprise.

“It is just possible that I may be Lord Avon.”

“What! you have had some news?” cried my uncle; and I noticed a tremor in his voice.

“I’ve had my agent over at Montevideo, and he believes he has proof that Avon died there. Anyhow, it is absurd to suppose that because a murderer chooses to fly from justice——”

“I won’t have you use that word, Sir Lothian,” cried my uncle, sharply.

“You were there, as I was. You know that he was a murderer.”

“I tell you that you shall not say so.”

Sir Lothian’s fierce little gray eyes had to lower themselves before the imperious anger which shone in my uncle’s.

“Well, to let that point pass, it is monstrous to suppose that the title and the estates can remain hung up in this way forever. I’m the heir, Tregellis, and, by God, I’m going to have my rights!”

“I am, as you are aware, Lord Avon’s dearest friend,” said my uncle sternly; “his disappearance has not affected my love for him, and until his fate is finally ascertained I shall exert myself to see that his rights also are respected."

"His rights would be a long drop and a cracked spine," Sir Lothian answered, and then, changing his manner suddenly, he laid his hand upon my uncle's sleeve.

"Come, come, Tregellis, I was his friend as well as you," said he; "but we can not alter the facts, and it is rather late in the day for us to fall out over them. Your invitation holds good for Friday night."

"Certainly."

"I shall bring Crab Wilson with me, and finally arrange the conditions of our little wager."

"Very good, Sir Lothian! I shall hope to see you."

They bowed, and my uncle stood for a little time looking after him as he made his way amid the crowd.

"A good sportsman, nephew," said he. "A bold rider, the best pistol-shot in England, but ——— a dangerous man!"

CHAPTER X.

THE MEN OF THE RING.

IT was at the end of my first week in London that my uncle gave a supper to the fancy, as was usual for gentlemen of that time if they wished to figure before the public as Corinthians and patrons of sport. He had invited not only the chief fighting men of the day, but also those men of fashion who were most interested in the ring, Mr. Fletcher Reid, Lord Saye and Sele, Sir Lothian Hume, Sir John Lade, Colonel Montgomery, Sir Thomas Apreece, the Honourable Berkeley Craven, and many more. The rumour that the prince was to be present had already spread through the clubs, and invitations were eagerly sought after.

The Wagon and Horses was a well-known sporting house with an old prize-fighter for landlord, and the arrangements were as primitive as the most Bohemian could wish. It was one of the many curious fashions which have now died out, that men who were blasé from luxury and high living seemed to find a fresh piquancy in life by descending to the lowest resorts, so that the night houses and gambling hells in Covent Garden or the Haymarket often gathered illustrious company under their smoke-blackened ceilings. It was a change for them to turn their backs upon the cooking of Weltjie and of Ude, or the Chambertin of old Q, and to dine upon a porterhouse steak washed down by a pint of ale from a pewter pot.

A rough crowd had assembled in the street to see the fighting men go in, and my uncle warned me to look to my pockets as we pushed our way through it. Within was a large room with faded red curtains, a sanded floor, and walls which were covered with prints of pugilists and racehorses. Brown liquor-stained tables were dotted about in it, and round one of these half a dozen formidable-looking men were seated, while one, the roughest of all, was perched upon the table itself, swinging his legs to and fro. A tray of small glasses and pewter mugs stood beside them.

"The boys were thirsty, sir, so I brought up some ale and some liptrap," whispered the landlord. "I thought you would have no objection, sir."

"Quite right, Bob!—How are you all?—How are you, Maddox?—How are you, Baldwin?—Ah, Belcher, I am very glad to see you.”

The fighting men all rose and took their hats off, except the fellow on the table, who continued to swing his legs and to look my uncle coolly in the face.

“How are you, Berks?”

“Pretty tidy. ’Ow are you?”

“Say ‘sir’ when you speak to a gentleman,” said Belcher, and with a sudden tilt of the table he sent Berks sliding almost into my uncle’s arms.

“See, now, Jim, none o’ that,” said Berks, sulkily.

“I’ll learn you manners, Joe, which is more than ever your father did. You’re not drinkin’ Black Jack in a boozin’ ken, but you are meetin’ noble, slap-up Corinthians, and it’s for you to behave as such.”

“I’ve always been reckoned a gen’elmanlike sort o’ man,” said Berks, thickly, “but if so be as I’ve said or done what I ’adn’t ought to——”

“There, there, Berks, that’s all right!” cried my uncle, only too anxious to smooth things over and to prevent a quarrel at the outset of the evening. “Here are some more of our friends.—How are you, Apreece?—How are you, colonel?—Well, Jackson, you are looking vastly better.—Good evening, Lade. I trust Lady Lade was none the worse for our pleasant drive.—Ah, Mendoza, you look fit enough to throw your hat over the ropes this instant.—Sir Lothian, I am glad to see you. You will find some old friends here.”

Amid the stream of Corinthians and fighting men who were thronging into the room I had caught a glimpse of the sturdy figure and broad, good-humoured face of Champion Harrison. The sight of him was like a whiff of South Down air coming into that low-roofed, oil-smelling room, and I ran forward to shake him by the hand.

“Why, Master Rodney—or I should say Mr. Stone, I suppose—you have changed out of all knowledge. I can’t believe that it was really you that used to come down to blow the bellows when Boy Jim and I were at the anvil. Well, you are fine, to be sure!”

“What’s the news at Friar’s Oak?” I asked eagerly.

“Your father was down to chat with me, Master Rodney, and he tells me that the war is going to break out, and that he hopes to see you here in London before many days are past, for he is coming up to see Lord Nelson and to make inquiry about a ship. Your mother is well, and I saw her in church on Sunday.”

“And Boy Jim?”

Champion Harrison's good-humoured face clouded over.

"He'd set his heart very much on coming here to-night, but there were reasons why I didn't wish him to, and so there's a shadow betwixt us. It's the first that ever was, and I feel it, Master Rodney. Between ourselves, I have very good reason to wish him to stay with me, and I am sure that, with his high spirit and his ideas, he would never settle down again after once he had a taste o' London. I left him behind me with enough work to keep him busy until I get back to him."

A tall and beautifully proportioned man, very elegantly dressed, was strolling toward us. He stared in surprise and held out his hand to my companion.

"Why, Jack Harrison!" he cried. "This is a resurrection. Where in the world did you come from?"

"Glad to see you, Jackson," said my companion. "You look as well and as young as ever."

"Thank you, yes. I resigned the belt when I could get no one to fight me for it, and I took to teaching."

"I'm doing smith's work down Sussex way."

"I've often wondered you never had a shy at my belt. I tell you honestly, between man and man, I'm very glad you didn't."

"Well, it's real good of you to say that, Jackson. I might have done it, perhaps, but the old woman was against it. She's been a good wife to me, and I can't go against her. But I feel a bit lonesome here, for these boys are all since my time."

"You could do some of them over now," said Jackson, feeling my friend's upper arm. "No better bit of stuff was ever seen in a twenty-four-foot ring. It would be a rare treat to see you take some of these young ones on. Won't you let me spring you on them?"

Harrison's eyes glistened at the idea, but he shook his head.

"It won't do, Jackson. My old woman holds my promise. That's Belcher, ain't it—the good-looking chap with the flash coat?"

"Yes, that's Jem. You've not seen him! He's a jewel."

"So I've heard. Who's the youngster beside him? He looks a tidy chap."

"That's a new man from the west. Crab Wilson's his name."

Champion Harrison looked at him curiously. "I've heard of him," said he. "They are getting a match on for him, ain't they?"

“Yes. Sir Lothian Hume, the thin-faced gentleman over yonder, has backed him against Sir Charles Tregellis’s man. We’re to hear about the match to-night. I understand Jem Belcher thinks great things of Crab Wilson. There’s Belcher’s young brother Tom. He’s looking out for a match, too. They say he’s quicker than Jem with the muffers, but he can’t hit as hard.—I was speaking of your brother, Jem.”

“The young ’un will make his way,” said Belcher, who had come across to us. “He’s more a sparrer than a fighter just at present, but when his gristle sets he’ll take on anything on the list. Bristol’s as full o’ young fightin’ men as a bin is o’ bottles. We’ve got two more comin’ up, Gully and Pearce, who’ll make you London milling coves wish they was back in the west country again.”

“Here’s the prince,” said Jackson, as a hum and bustle rose from the door.

I saw George come bustling in with a good-humoured smile upon his comely face. My uncle welcomed him, and led some of the Corinthians up to be presented.

“We’ll have trouble, gov’nor,” said Belcher to Jackson. “Here’s Joe Berks drinkin’ gin out of a mug, and you know what a swine he is when he’s drunk.”

"You must put a stopper on him, gov'nor," said several of the other prize-fighters. "He ain't what you call a charmer when he's sober, but there's no standin' him when he's fresh."

Jackson, on account of his prowess, and of the tact which he possessed, had been chosen as general regulator of the whole prize-fighting body, by whom he was usually alluded to as the commander-in-chief. He and Belcher went across now to the table upon which Berks was still perched. The ruffian's face was already flushed, and his eyes heavy and bloodshot.

"You must keep yourself in hand to-night, Berks," said Jackson. "The prince is here; and——"

"I never set eyes on 'im yet," cried Berks, lurching off the table. "Where is 'e, gov'nor? Tell 'im Joe Berks would like to do hisself proud by shakin' 'im by the 'and."

"No, you don't, Joe," said Jackson, laying his hand upon Berks's chest, as he tried to push his way through the crowd. "You've got to keep your place, Joe, or we'll put you where you can make all the noise you like."

"Where's that, gov'nor?"

"Into the street through the window. We're going to have a peaceful evening, as Jem Belcher and I will show you if you get up to any of your Whitechapel games."

"No 'arm, gov'nor," grumbled Berks. "I'm sure I've always 'ad the name of being a very gen'elmanlike man."

"So I've always said, Joe Berks, and mind you prove yourself such. But the supper is ready for us, and there's the prince and Lord Sele going in.—Two and two, lads, and don't forget whose company you are in."

The supper was laid in a large room with Union Jacks and mottoes hung thickly upon the walls. The tables were arranged in three sides of a square, my uncle occupying the centre of the principal one, with the prince upon his right and Lord Sele upon his left. By his wise precaution the seats had been allotted beforehand, so that the gentlemen might be scattered among the professionals and no risk run of two enemies finding themselves together, or a man who had been recently beaten falling into the company of his conqueror. For my own part, I had Champion Harrison upon one side of me and a short, florid-faced man upon the other, who whispered to me that he was "Bill Warr, landlord of the One Tun public house of Jermyn Street, and one of the gamest men upon the list."

"It's my flesh that's beat me, sir," said he.

"It creeps over me amazin' fast. I should fight at thirteen-eight, and 'ere I am nearly seventeen. It's the business that does it. What with lollin' about behind the bar all day, and bein' afraid to refuse a wet for fear of offendin' a customer. It's been the ruin of many a good fighting man before me."

"You should take to my job," said Harrison. "I'm a smith by trade, and I've not put on half a stone in fifteen years."

"Some take to one thing and some to another, but the most of us try to have a bar parlor of our own. There's Will Wood that I beat in forty rounds in the middle of a snowstorm down Navestock way. He drives a 'ackney. Young Firby, the ruffian, he's a waiter now. Dick Humphries sells coals—he was always of a gentlemanly disposition. George Inglestone is a brewer's drayman. We all find our own cribs. But there's one thing you are saved by livin' in the country, and that is havin' the young Corinthians and bloods about town smackin' you eternally in the face."

This was the last inconvenience which I should have expected a famous prize-fighter to be subjected to, but several bull-faced fellows at the other side of the table nodded their concurrence.

"You're right, Bill," said one of them. "There's no one has had more trouble with them than I have. In they come of an evenin' into my bar, with the wine in their heads. 'Are you Tom Owen the Bruiser?' says one o' them. 'At your service, sir,' says I. 'Take that, then,' says he, and it's a clip on the nose, or a backhanded slap across the chops as likely as not. Then they can brag all their lives that they had hit Tom Owen."

"D' you draw their cork in return?"

"I argey it out with them. I say to them, 'Now, gents, fightin' is my profession, and I don't fight for love any more than a doctor doctors for love or a butcher gives away a loin chop. Put up a small purse, master, and I'll do you over, and proud. But don't expect that you're goin' to come here and get knocked about by a middle-weight champion for nothing.'"

"That's my way, too, Tom," said my burly neighbour. "If they put down a guinea on the counter, which they do if they have been drinkin' very heavy, I give them what I think is about a guinea's worth and take the money."

"But if they don't?"

"Why, then it's a common assault, d'ye see, against the body of his Majesty's liege, William Warr, and I has 'em before the beak next mornin', and it's a week or twenty shillin's."

Meanwhile the supper was in full swing—one of those solid and uncompromising meals which prevailed in the days of your grandfathers, and which may explain to some of you why you never set eyes upon that relative. Great rounds of beef, saddles of mutton, smoking tongues, veal and ham pies, turkeys and chickens and geese, with every variety of vegetables, and a succession of fiery sherries and heavy ales, were the main staple of the feast.

It was the same meal and the same cooking as their Norse or German ancestors might have sat down to fourteen centuries before, and indeed, as I looked through the steam of the dishes at the lines of fierce and rugged faces, and the mighty shoulders which rounded themselves over the board, I could have imagined myself at one of those old-world carousals of which I had read, where the savage company gnawed the joints to the bone, and then with murderous horse-play hurled the remains at their prisoners. Here and there the pale aquiline features of a sporting Corinthian recalled rather the Norman type, but in the main these stolid, heavy-jowled faces, belonging to men whose whole life was a battle, were the nearest suggestion which we have had in modern times of those fierce pirates and rovers from whose loins we have sprung.

And yet as I looked carefully from man to man in the line which faced me, I could see that the English, although they were ten to one, had not the game entirely to themselves, but that other races had shown that they could produce fighting men worthy to rank with the best. There were, it is true, no finer or braver men in the room than Jackson and Jem Belcher, the one with his magnificent figure, his small waist and herculean shoulders, the other as graceful as an old Grecian statue, with a head whose beauty many a sculptor had wished to copy, and with those long, delicate lines in shoulder and loins and limbs which gave him the litheness and activity of a panther. Already as I looked at him, it seemed to me that there was a shadow of tragedy upon his face, a forecast of the day then but a few months distant, when a blow from a racquet ball darkened the sight of one eye forever. Had he stopped there with his unbeaten career behind him, then indeed the evening of his life might have been as glorious as its dawn. But his proud heart could not permit his title to be torn from him without a struggle. If even now you can read how the gallant fellow, unable with his one eye to judge his distances, fought for thirty-five minutes against his young and most formidable opponent, and how in the bitterness of defeat he was heard only to express his sorrow for a friend who had backed him with all he possessed, and if you are not touched by the story, there must be something wanting in you which should go to the making of a man.

But if there were no men at the tables who could have held their own against Jackson or Jem Belcher, there were others of a different race and type who had qualities which made them dangerous bruisers. A little way down the table I saw the black face and woolly head of Bill Richmond, in a purple and gold footman's livery—destined to be the predecessor of Molyneux, Sutton, and all that line of black boxers, who have shown that the muscular power and insensibility to pain which distinguish the African gave him a peculiar advantage in the sports of the ring. He could boast also of the higher honour of having been the first born American to win laurels in the British ring. There also I saw the keen features of Dan Mendoza, the Jew, just returned from active work, and leaving behind him a reputation for elegance and perfect science which has to this day never been exceeded.

The worst fault that the critics could find with him was that there was a want of power in his blows—a remark which certainly could not have been made about his neighbour, whose long face, curved nose, and dark, flashing eyes proclaimed him as a member of the same ancient race. This was the formidable Dutch Sam, who fought at nine stone six, and yet possessed such hitting powers that his admirers in after years were willing to back him against the fourteen-stone Tom Cribb, if each were strapped a-straddle to a bench. Half a dozen other sallow Hebrew faces showed how energetically the Jews of Houndsditch and Whitechapel had taken to the sport of the land of their adoption, and that in this, as in more serious fields of human effort, they could hold their own with the best.

It was my neighbour Warr who very good-humouredly pointed out to me all these celebrities, the echoes of whose fame had been wafted down even to our little Sussex village.

“There’s Andrew Gamble, the Irish champion,” said he. “It was ’e that beat Noah James, the guardsman, and was afterward nearly killed by Jem Belcher in the ’ollow of Wimbledon Common by Abbershaw’s gibbet. The two that sit next him are Irish also—Jack O’Donnell and Bill Ryan. When you get a good Irishman you can’t better ’em, but they’re dreadful ’asty. That little cove with the leery face is Caleb Baldwin the coster, 'im that they call the pride of Westminster. He is but five foot seven, and nine stone five, but he's got the 'cart of a giant. 'E's never been beat, and there ain't a man within a stone of 'im that could beat 'im, except only Dutch Sam. There's George Maddox, too, another o' the same breed, and as good a man as ever pulled his coat off. The gentlemanlike man that eats with a fork, 'im what looks like a Corinthian, only that the bridge of 'is nose ain't quite what it ought to be, that's Dick Humphries, the same that was cock of the middle-weights until Mendoza cut his comb for him. You see the other with the gray 'ead and the scars on his face?"

"Why, it's old Tom Faulkner, the cricketer!" cried Harrison, following the line of Bill Warr's stubby forefinger. "He's the best bowler in the Midlands, and at his best there weren't many boxers in England that could stand up against him."

"You're right there," Jack Harrison. "He was one of the three who came up to fight when the best men of Birmingham challenged the best men of London. He's an evergreen, is Tom. Why, he was turned five and fifty when he challenged and beat, after fifty minutes of it, Jack Thornhill, who was tough enough to take it out of many a youngster. It's better to give odds in weight than in years."

"Youth will be served," said a crooning voice from the other side of the table. "Ay, masters, youth will be served."

The man who had spoken was the most extraordinary of all the many curious figures in the room. He was very old, so old that he was past all comparison, and no one, by looking at his mummy skin and fishlike eyes, could give a guess at his years.

A few scanty gray hairs still hung about his yellow scalp. As to his features, they were scarcely human in their disfigurement, for the deep wrinkles and pouchings of extreme age had been added to a face which had always been grotesquely ugly, and had been crushed and bruised, in addition, by many a blow. I had noticed this creature at the beginning of the meal, leaning his chest against the edge of the table, as if its support was a welcome one, and feebly picking at the food which was placed before him. Gradually, however, as his neighbours plied him with drink, his shoulders grew squarer, his back stiffened, his eyes brightened; and he looked about him with an air of surprise at first, as if he had no clear recollection of how he came there, and afterward with an expression of deepening interest as he listened with his ear scooped up in his hand to the conversation around him.

"That's old Buckhorse," whispered Champion Harrison. "He was just the same as that when I joined the ring three and twenty years ago. Time was when he was the terror of London."

"He was so," said Bill Warr. "'E would fight like a stag, and 'e was that 'ard that 'e would let any swell knock him down for 'alf a crown. 'E 'ad no face to spoil; d'ye see, for he was always the ugliest man in England. But 'e's been on the shelf now for near sixty years, and it cost him many a beatin' before he could understand that his strength was slippin' away from him."

"Youth will be served, masters," droned the old man, shaking his head miserably.

"Fill up 'is glass," said Warr. "Here, Tom, give old Buckhorse a sup o' liptrap. Warm his old 'eart for 'im."

The old man poured a glass of neat gin down his shrivelled throat, and the effect upon him was extraordinary. A light glimmered in each of his dull eyes, a tinge of colour came into his waxlike cheeks, and, opening his toothless mouth, he suddenly emitted a peculiar bell-like and most musical cry. A hoarse roar of laughter from all the company answered it, and flushed faces craned over each other to catch a glimpse of the veteran.

"There's Buckhorse!" they cried. "Buckhorse is comin' round again."

"You can laugh if you will, masters," he cried, in his Lewkner Lane dialect, holding up his two thin, vein-covered hands. "It won't be long that you'll be able to see my crooks vich 'ave been on Fig's conk and on Jack Broughton's, and on Harry Gray's and on many another good fightin' man that was millin' for a livin' before your fathers could eat pap."

The company laughed again, and encouraged the old man by half-derisive, half-affectionate cries.

"Let 'em 'ave it, Buckhorse! Give it 'em straight! Tell us how the millin' coves did it in your time."

The old gladiator looked round him in great contempt.

"Vy, from what I see," he cried, in his high broken treble, "there's some of you that ain't fit to flick a fly from a joint o' meat. You'd make wery good ladies' maids, the most o' you, but you took the wrong turnin' ven you came into the ring."

"Give 'im a wipe over the mouth!" said a hoarse voice.

“Joe Berks,” said Jackson, “I’d save the hangman the job of breaking your neck if his Royal Highness wasn’t in the room.”

“That’s as it may be, gov’nor,” said the half-drunken ruffian, staggering to his feet. “If I’ve said anything what isn’t gen’elmanlike——”

“Sit down, Berks!” cried my uncle, with such a tone of command that the fellow collapsed into his chair.

“Vy, vich of you could look Jack Slack in the face?” piped the old fellow, “or Jack Broughton, him vot told the old Dook o’ Cumberland that all he wanted was to fight the King o’ Proosia’s guard, day by day, year in and year out, until ‘e ‘ad worked out the whole regiment of ‘em, and the smallest of ‘em six foot long? There’s not more’n a few of you could ‘it a dint in a pat o’ butter, and if you gets a smack or two it’s all over with you. Vich among you could get up again after such a vipe as the Eytalian Gondoleery cove gave to Bob Vittaker?”

“What was that, Buckhorse?” cried several voices.

“‘E came over ‘ere from voreign parts, and ‘e was so broad ‘e ‘ad to come edgewise through the doors. ‘E ‘ad to, upon my davy! ‘E was that strong that whenever ‘e ‘it the bone ‘ad got to go, and when ‘e’d cracked a jaw or two it looked as though nothing in the country could stan' against 'im. So the king 'e sent one of his genelmen down to Fig, and he said to him, "'Ere's a cove vot cracks a bone every time he lets vly, and it'll be little credit to the Lunnon boys if they lets 'im get away without a vacking.' So Fig he ups and he says, 'I do not know, master, but he may break one of his countrymen's jawbones vid his vist, but I'll bring him a Cockney lad and he shall not be able to break his jawbone with a sledge hammer.' I was with Fig in Slaughter's coffee house, as then was, ven he says this to the king's genelman, and I goes so, I does!" Again he emitted the curious bell-like cry, and again the Corinthians and the fighting men laughed and applauded him.

"His Royal Highness—that is, the Earl of Chester—would be glad to hear the end of your story, Buckhorse," said my uncle, to whom the prince had been whispering.

"Vell, your ryal 'ighness, it was like this: Ven the day came round all the volk came to Fig's amphitheatre, the same that was in Tottenham Court, an' Bob Vittaker 'e was there, and the Eytalian Gondoleery cove 'e was there, and all the perlitest, gentellest crowd that ever vos, twenty thousand of 'em, all sittin' with their 'eads like purtaties on a barrer, banked right up round the stage, and me there to pick up Bob, d'ye see, and Jack Fig 'imself just for fair play, to do vat was right by the cove from voreign parts. They vos packed all round, the folks was, but down through the middle of 'em was a passage, just so as the gentry could come through to their seats, and the stage it was of wood, as the custom then was, and a man's 'ight above the 'eads of the people.

“ Vell, then, ven Bob was put up opposite this great Eytalian man I says, ‘ Slap 'im in the vind, Bob, ’ cos I could see vid 'alf an eye that he was as puffy as a cheesecake, so Bob he goes in, and as he comes the voriner let 'im 'ave it amazin' on the conk. I 'eard the thump of it, and I kind o' velt somethin' vistle past me, but ven I looked there was the Eytalian a feelin' of his muscles in the middle o' the stage, and as to Bob there weren't no sign of 'im at all, no more'n if he'd never been.”

His audience were riveted by the old prize-fighter's story. “ Well,” cried a dozen voices, “ what then, Buckhorse ; 'ad 'e swallowed 'im, or what ? ”

“ Vell, boys, that was vot I wondered, when sudden I seed two legs a-stickin' up out o' the crowd a long vay off, just like these two vingers, d'ye see, and I knowed they was Bob's legs, seein' that 'e 'ad kind o' yellow small-clothes wid blue ribbons—vich blue was his color—at the knee. So they upended 'im, they did, an' they made a lane for 'im and cheered 'im to give 'im 'eart, though he never lacked for that. At first 'e was that dazed that 'e didn't know if 'e was in church or in 'Orsmonger jail, but ven I'd bit 'is two ears he shook 'isself together. 'Ve'll try it again, Buck,' says 'e. 'The mark,' says I. And 'e vinked all that was left o' one eye. So the Eytalian he lets swing again, but Bob 'e jumps inside and 'e lets 'im 'ave it plumb square on the meat safe, as 'ard as ever the Lord would let 'im put it in."

"Well? well?"

"Vell, the Eytalian got a touch o' the gurgles an' 'e shut himself right up like a two-foot rule. Then 'e pulled 'imself straight an' 'e gave the most awful glory allelujah screech as ever you 'eard. Off he jumps from the stage and down the passage as 'ard as 'is 'oofs would carry 'im. Up jumps the 'ole crowd, and after 'im as 'ard as they could move for laughin'. They was lyin' in the kennel three deep all down Tottenham Court road, wid their 'ands to their sides just vit to break themselves in two. Vell, we chased 'im down 'Olburn an' down Fleet Street an' down Cheapside, an' past the 'Change and on all the way to Wapping, an' we only caught 'im in the shippin' office, 'vere 'e was askin' 'ow soon 'e could get a passage to voreign parts."

There was much laughter and clapping of glasses on the table at the conclusion of old Buckhorse's story, and I saw the Prince of Wales hand something to the waiter, who brought it round and slipped it into the skinny hand of the veteran, who spat upon it before thrusting it into his pocket. The table had, in the meantime, been cleared, and was now studded with bottles and glasses, while long clay pipes and tobacco boxes were handed round. My uncle never smoked, thinking the habit might darken his teeth, but many of the Corinthians, and the prince among the first of them, set the example of lighting up. All restraint had now been done away with, and the prize-fighters, flushed with wine, roared across the tables to each other, or shouted their greetings to friends at the other end of the room. The amateurs, falling into the humour of their company, were hardly less noisy, and loudly debated the merits of the different men, criticising their styles of fighting before their faces, and making bets upon the results of future matches.

In the midst of the uproar there was an imperative rap upon the table, and my uncle rose to speak. As he stood with his pale, calm face and fine figure, I had never seen him to greater advantage, for he seemed, with all his elegance, to have a quiet air of domination among these fierce fellows, like a huntsman walking carelessly through a springing and yapping pack. He expressed his pleasure at seeing so many good sportsmen under one roof, and acknowledged the honour which had been done, both to his guests and himself, by the presence there that night of the illustrious personage whom he should refer to as the Earl of Chester. He was sorry that the season prevented him from placing game upon the table, but there was so much sitting round it that it would perhaps be hardly missed (cheers and laughter). The sports of the ring had in his opinion tended to that contempt of pain and of danger which had contributed so much in the past to the safety of the country, and which might, if what he heard was true, be very quickly needed once more. If an enemy landed upon our shores it was then that, with our small army, we should be compelled to fall back upon native valour, trained into hardihood by the practice and contemplation of manly sports. In times of peace also the rules of the ring had been of service in enforcing the principles of fair play, and in turning public opinion against that use of the knife or of the boot which was so common in foreign countries. He begged, therefore, to drink success to the fancy, coupled with the name of John Jackson, who might stand as a type of all that was most admirable in British boxing.

Jackson having replied with a readiness which many a public man might have envied, my uncle rose once more.

“We are here to-night,” said he, “not only to celebrate the glories of the prize ring, but also to arrange some sport for the future. It should be easy, now that backers and fighting men are gathered together under one roof, to come to terms with each other. I have myself set an example by making a match with Sir Lothian Hume, the terms of which will be communicated to you by that gentleman.”

Sir Lothian rose with a paper in his hand.

“The terms, your Royal Highness and gentlemen, are briefly these,” said he. “My man, Crab Wilson, of Gloucester, having never yet fought a prize battle, is prepared to meet, upon May 18th of this year, any man of any weight who may be selected by Sir Charles Tregellis. Sir Charles Tregellis’s selection is limited to men below twenty or above thirty-five years of age, so as to exclude Belcher and the other candidates for championship honours. The stakes are two thousand against a thousand, two hundred to be paid by the winner to his man, play or pay."

It was curious to see the intense gravity of them all, fighters and backers, as they bent their brows and weighed the conditions of the match.

"I am informed," said Sir John Lade, "that Crab Wilson's age is twenty-three, and that, although he has never fought a regular P. R. battle, he has none the less fought within ropes for a stake on many occasions."

"I've seen him half a dozen times at the least," said Belcher.

"It is precisely for that reason, Sir John, that I am laying odds of ten to one in his favour."

"May I ask," said the prince, "what the exact height and weight of Wilson may be?"

"Five foot eleven and thirteen ten, your Royal Highness."

"Long enough and heavy enough for anything on two legs," said Jackson, and the professionals all murmured their assent.

"Read the rules of the fight, Sir Lothian."

"The battle to take place on Tuesday, May 18th, at the hour of ten in the morning, at a spot to be afterward named. The ring to be twenty feet square. Neither to fall without a knock-down blow, subject to the decision of the umpires. Three umpires to be chosen upon the ground—namely, two in ordinary and one in reference. Does that meet with your wishes, Sir Charles?”

My uncle bowed.

“Have you anything to say, Wilson?”

The young pugilist, who had a curious, lanky figure and a craggy, bony face, passed his fingers through his close-cropped hair.

“If you please, zir,” said he, with a slight west country burr, “a twenty-foot ring is too small for a thirteen-stone man.”

There was another murmur of professional agreement.

“What would you have it then, Wilson?”

“Vour and twenty, Sir Lothian.”

“Have you any objections, Sir Charles?”

“Not the slightest.”

“Anything else, Wilson?”

“If you please, zir, I’d like to know whom I’m fighting with.”

“I understand that you have not nominated your man, Sir Charles?”

“I do not intend to do so until the very morning of the fight. I believe I have that right within the terms of our wager.”

“Certainly, if you choose to exercise it.”

“I do so intend. And I should be vastly pleased if Mr. Berkeley Craven will consent to be stakeholder."

That gentleman having given his consent, the final formalities which led up to these humble tournaments were concluded.

And then as these full-blooded, powerful men became heated with their wine, angry eyes began to gleam across the table, and amid the gray swirls of tobacco the lamplight gleamed upon the fierce, hawklike Jews and the flushed, savage Saxons. The old quarrel as to whether Jackson had or had not committed a foul by seizing Mendoza by the hair on the occasion of their battle at Hornchurch eight years before, came to the front once more. Dutch Sam hurled a shilling down upon the table and offered to fight the Pride of Westminster for it if he ventured to say that Mendoza had been fairly beaten. Joe Berks, who had grown noisier and more quarrelsome as the evening went on, tried to clamber across the table with horrible blasphemies to come to blows with an old Jew named Fighting Jussef, who had plunged into the discussion. It needed very little more to finish the supper by a general and ferocious battle, and it was only the exertions of Jackson, Belcher, Harrison, and others of the cooler and steadier men which saved us from a riot.

And then, when at last this question was set aside, that of the rival claims to championship at different weights came on in its stead, and again angry words flew about and challenges were in the air. There was no exact limit between the light, middle, and heavy-weights, and yet it would make a very great difference to the standing of a boxer whether he should be regarded as the heaviest of the light-weights or the lightest of the heavy-weights. One claimed to be ten-stone champion, another was ready to take on anything at eleven, but would not run to twelve, which would have brought the invincible Jem Belcher down upon him. Faulkner claimed to be champion of the seniors, and even old Buckhorse's curious call rang out above the tumult as he turned the whole company to laughter and good humour again by challenging anything over eighty and under seven stone.

But in spite of gleams of sunshine there was thunder in the air, and Champion Harrison had just whispered in my ear that he was quite sure we should never get through the night without trouble, and was advising me, if it got very bad, to take refuge under the table, when the landlord entered the room hurriedly and handed a note to my uncle. He read it and then passed it to the prince, who returned it with raised eyebrows and a gesture of surprise. Then he rose with the scrap of paper in his hand and a smile upon his lips.

CHAPTER XI.

THE FIGHT IN THE COACH HOUSE.

THE curt announcement was followed by a moment of silent surprise, and then by a general shout of laughter. There might be argument as to who was the champion at each weight, but there could be no question that all the champions of all the weights were seated round the tables. An audacious challenge, which embraced them one and all, without regard to size or age, could hardly be regarded otherwise than as a joke, but it was a joke that might be a dear one for the joker.

“Is this genuine?” asked my uncle.

“Don’t you believe it!” answered the landlord. “He’s a real slap-up Corinthian by his dress, and he means what he says, or else I ain’t no judge of a man.”

My uncle whispered for a few moments with the Prince of Wales. "Well, gentlemen," said he at last, "the night is still young, and if any of you should wish to show the company a little of your skill you could not wish a better opportunity."

"What weight is he, Bill?" asked Jem Belcher.

"He's close onto six foot and I should put him well up into the thirteen stone when he's buffed."

"Heavy metal!" cried Jackson. "Who takes him on?"

They all wanted to, from the nine-stone Dutch Sam upward. The air was filled with their hoarse shouts, and their arguments why each should be the chosen one. To fight when they were flushed with wine and ripe for mischief—above all, to fight before so select a company, with the prince himself by the ring side—was a chance which did not often come in their way. Only Jackson, Belcher, Mendoza, and one or two others of the senior and more famous men remained silent, thinking it beneath their dignity that they should condescend to so irregular a bye-battle.

"Well, you can't all fight him," remarked Jackson, when the babel had died away. "It's for the chairman to choose."

"Perhaps your Royal Highness has a preference," said my uncle.

"By Jove, I'd take him on myself if my position was different from what it is," said the prince, whose face was growing redder and his eyes more glazed. "You've seen me with the mufflers, Jackson! You know my form?"

"I've seen your Royal Highness, and I've felt your Royal Highness," said the courtly Jackson.

"Perhaps Jem Belcher would give us an exhibition," said my uncle.

Belcher smiled, and shook his handsome head.

"There's my brother Tom here, who has never been blooded in London, sir. He might make a fairer match of it."

"Give 'im over to me!" roared Joe Berks. "I've been waitin' for a turn all evening, an' I'll fight any man that tries to take my place. 'E's my meat, my masters. Leave 'im to me if you want to see how a calf's head should be dressed. If you put Tom Belcher before me I'll fight Tom Belcher, and for that matter I'll fight Jem Belcher, or Bill Belcher, or any other Belcher that ever came out of Bristol."

It was clear that Berks had got to the stage when he must fight some one. His heavy face was gorged and the veins stood out on his low forehead, while his fierce gray eyes looked viciously from man to man in quest of a quarrel. His great red hands were bunched into huge gnarled fists, and he shook one of them menacingly as his drunken gaze swept round the tables.

"I think you'll agree with me, gentlemen, that Joe Berks would be all the better for some fresh air and exercise," said my uncle. "With the concurrence of his Royal Highness and of the company I shall select him as our champion on this occasion."

"You do me proud," cried the fellow, staggering to his feet and pulling at his coat. "If I don't glut him within the five minutes may I never see Shropshire again!"

"Wait a bit, Berks," cried several of the amateurs. "Where's it going to be held?"

"Where you like, masters. I'll fight him in a sawpit or on the outside of a coach, if it please you. Put us toe to toe, and leave the rest with me."

"They can't fight here with all this litter," said my uncle. "Where shall it be?"

"'Pon my soul, Tregellis," cried the prince, "I think our unknown friend might have a word to say upon that matter. He'll be vastly ill used if you don't let him have his own choice of conditions."

"You are right, sir. We must have him up."

"That's easy enough," said the landlord, "for here he comes through the doorway."

I glanced round, and had a side view of a tall and well-dressed young man, in a long brown travelling coat and a black felt hat. The next instant he had turned, and I had clutched with both my hands onto Champion Harrison's arm.

"Harrison!" I gasped, "it's Boy Jim!"

And yet somehow the possibility and even the probability of it had occurred to me from the beginning, and I believe that it had to Champion Harrison also, for I had noticed that his face grew grave and troubled from the very moment that there was talk of the stranger below. Now, the instant that the buzz of surprise and admiration which was caused by Jim's face and figure had died away, Harrison was on his feet, gesticulating in his excitement.

"It's my nephew, Jim, gentlemen," he cried. "He's not twenty yet, and it's no doing of mine that he should be here."

"Let him alone, Harrison," cried Jackson. "He's big enough to take care of himself."

"This matter has gone rather far," said my uncle. "I think, Harrison, that you are too good a sportsman to prevent your nephew from showing whether he takes after his uncle."

"It's very different from me," cried Harrison, in great distress. "But I'll tell you what I'll do, gentlemen. I never thought to stand up in a ring again, but I'll take on Joe Berks with pleasure, just to give a bit of sport to this company."

Boy Jim stepped across and laid his hand upon the prize-fighter's shoulder.

"It must be so, uncle," I heard him whisper. "I am sorry to go against your wishes, but I have made up my mind, and I must carry it through."

Harrison shrugged his broad shoulders.

"Jim, Jim, you don't know what you are doing! But I've heard you speak like that before, and I know that it ends in your getting your way."

"I trust, Harrison, that your opposition is withdrawn," said my uncle.

"Can I not take his place?"

"You would not have it said that I gave a challenge and let another carry it out," whispered Boy Jim. "This is my one chance. For Heaven's sake don't stand in my way!"

The smith's broad and usually stolid face was working with his conflicting emotions. At last he banged his fist down upon the table.

"It's no fault of mine!" he cried. "It was to be and it is.—Jim, boy, for the Lord's sake, remember your distances, and stick to out-fighting with a man that could give you a stone."

"I was sure that Harrison would not stand in the way of sport," said my uncle. "We are glad that you have stepped up that we might consult you as to the arrangements for giving effect to your very sporting challenge."

"Whom am I to fight?" asked Jim, looking round at the company, who were now all upon their feet.

"Young man, you'll know enough of who you 'ave to fight before you are through with it," cried Berks, lurching heavily through the crowd. "You'll need a friend to swear to you before I've finished, d'ye see?"

Jim looked at him with disgust in every line of his face.

"Surely you are not going to set me to fight a drunken man," said he. "Where's Jem Belcher?"

"My name, young man."

"I should be glad to try you, if I may."

"You must work up to me, my lad. You don't take a ladder at one jump, but you do it rung by rung. Show yourself to be a match for me, and I'll give you a turn."

"I'm much obliged to you," said Jim.

"And I like the look of you and I wish you well," said Belcher, holding out his hand. They were not unlike each other either in face or figure, though the Bristol man was a few years the older, and a murmur of critical admiration was heard as the two tall, lithe figures and clean-cut faces were contrasted.

"Have you any choice where the fight takes place?" asked my uncle.

"I am in your hands, sir," said Jim.

"Why not go round to the Fives Court?" suggested Sir John Lade.

"Yes, let us all go to the Fives Court."

But this did not at all suit the views of the landlord, who saw in this lucky incident a chance of reaping a fresh harvest from his spendthrift company.

"If it please you," he cried, "there is no need to go so far. My coach house at the back of the yard is empty, and a better place for a mill you'll never find."

There was a general shout in favour of the coach house, and those who were nearest the door began to slip through in the hope of securing the best places. My stout neighbour, Bill Warr, pulled Harrison to one side.

"I'd stop it if I were you," he whispered.

"I would if I could. It's no wish of mine that he should fight. But there's no turning him when once his mind is set."

All his own fights put together had never reduced the pugilist to such a state of agitation.

"Wait on 'im yourself, then, and chuck up the sponge when things begin to go wrong. You know Joe Berks's record?"

"He's since my time."

"Well, he's a terror, that's all. It's only Belcher that can master 'im. You see the man for yourself, six foot, fourteen stone, and full of the devil. Belcher's beat 'im twice, but the second time 'e 'ad all 'is work to do it."

"Well, well, we've got to go through with it. You've not seen Boy Jim put his mawlays up, or maybe you'd think better of his chances. When he was short of sixteen he licked the cock of the South Downs, and he's come on a long way since then."

The company was swarming through the door and clattering down the stair as we followed in the stream. A fine rain was falling, and the yellow lights from the windows glistened upon the wet cobblestones in the yard. How welcome that sweet breath of damp air was after the fetid atmosphere of the supper room! At the other end of the yard was an open door, sharply outlined by the gleam of lanterns within, and through this they poured, amateurs and fighting men jostling each other in their eagerness to get to the front. For my own part, being a smallish man, I should have seen nothing had I not found an upturned bucket in a corner upon which I perched myself with the wall at my back.

It was a large room, with a wooden floor and an open square in the ceiling, which was fringed with the heads of the hostlers and stable boys who were looking down from the harness room above. A carriage lamp was slung in each corner, and a very large stable lantern hung from a rafter in the centre. A coil of rope had been brought in, and, under the direction of Jackson, four men had been stationed to hold it.

“What space do you give them?” asked my uncle.

“Twenty-four, as they are both big ones, sir.”

“Very good, and half minutes between rounds, I suppose. I’ll umpire if Sir Lothian Hume will do the same, and you can hold the watch and referee, Jackson.”

With great speed and exactness every preparation was rapidly made by these experienced men. Mendoza and Dutch Sam were commissioned to attend to Berks, while Champion Harrison did the same for Boy Jim. Sponges, towels, and some brandy in a bladder were passed over the heads of the crowd for the use of the seconds.

"Here's our man," cried Belcher.—"Come along, Berks, or we'll go to fetch you."

Jim had appeared in the ring stripped to the waist, with a coloured handkerchief tied round his middle. A shout of admiration came from the spectators as they looked upon the fine lines of his figure, and I found myself roaring with the rest. His shoulders were sloping rather than bulky, and his chest was deep rather than broad, but the muscle was all in the right place, rippling down in long, low curves from neck to shoulder, and from shoulder to elbow. His work at the anvil had developed his arms to their utmost, and his healthy country living gave a sleek gloss to his ivory skin, which shone in the lamplight. His expression was full of spirit and confidence, and he wore a grim sort of half-smile which I had seen many a time in our boyhood, and which meant, I knew, that his pride had set iron hard, and that his senses would fail him long before his courage.

Joe Berks in the meanwhile had swaggered in and stood with folded arms between his seconds in the opposite corner. His face had none of the eager alertness of his opponent, and his skin, of a dead white, with heavy folds about the chest and ribs, showed even to my inexperienced eyes that he was not a man who should fight without training. A life of toping and ease had left him flabby and gross. On the other hand, he was famous for his mettle and for his hitting power, so that even in face of the advantages of youth and condition the betting was three to one in his favour. His heavy-jowled, clean-shaven face expressed ferocity as well as courage, and he stood with his small bloodshot eyes fixed viciously upon Jim, and his lumpy shoulders stooping a little forward like a fierce hound straining on a leash.

The hubbub of the betting had risen until it had drowned all other sounds, men shouting their opinions from one side of the coach house to the other, and waving their hands to attract attention, or as a sign that they had accepted a wager. Sir John Lade, standing just in front of me, was roaring out the odds against Jim, and laying them freely with those who fancied the appearance of the unknown.

“I’ve seen Berks fight,” said he to the Hon. Berkeley Craven. “No country hawbuck is going to knock out a man with such a record.”

“He may be a country hawbuck,” the other answered; “but I have been reckoned a judge of anything either on two legs or four, and I tell you, Sir John, that I never saw a man who looked better breed in my life. Are you still laying against him?"

"Three to one."

"Have you once in hundreds!"

"Very good, Craven! There they go!—Berks! Berks! Bravo, Berks! bravo!—I think, Craven, that I shall trouble you for that hundred."

The two men had stood up to each other, Jim as light upon his feet as a goat, with his left well out and his right thrown across the lower part of his chest, while Berks held both arms half extended and his feet almost level so that he might lead off with either side. For an instant they looked each other over, and then Berks, ducking his head and rushing in with a hand-over-hand style of hitting, bored Jim down into his corner. It was a backward slip rather than a knockdown, but a thin trickle of blood was seen at the corner of Jim's mouth. In an instant the seconds had seized their men and carried them back into their corners.

"Do you mind doubling our bet?" said Berkeley Craven, who was craning his neck to get a glimpse of Jim.

"Four to one on Berks! Four to one on Berks!" cried the ringsiders.

"The odds have gone up, you see. Will you have four to one in hundreds?"

“Very good, Sir John.”

“You seem to fancy him more for having been knocked down.”

“He was pushed down, but he stopped every blow, and I liked the look on his face as he got up again.”

“Well, it’s the old stager for me. Here they come again! He’s got a pretty style, and he covers his points well, but it isn’t the best-looking that wins.”

They were at it again, and I was jumping about upon my bucket in my excitement. It was evident that Berks meant to finish the battle off-hand, while Jim, with two of the most experienced men in England to advise him, was quite aware that his correct tactics were to allow the ruffian to expend his strength and win in vain. There was something horrible in the ferocious energy of Berks’s hitting, every blow fetching a grunt from him as he smashed it in, and after each I gazed at Jim, as I have gazed at a stranded vessel upon the Sussex beach when wave after wave has roared over it, fearing each time that I should find it miserably mangled. But still the lamplight shone upon the lad’s clear alert face, upon his well-opened eyes and his firm-set mouth, while the blows were taken upon his forearm or allowed, by a quick duck of the head, to whistle over his shoulder. But Berks was artful as well as violent. Gradually he worked Jim back into an angle of the ropes from which there was no escape, and then when he had him fairly pinned he sprang upon him like a tiger. What happened was so quick that I can not set its sequence down in words, but I saw Jim make a quick stoop under the swinging arms, and at the same instant I heard a ringing smack, and there was Jim dancing about in the middle of the ring, and Berks lying upon his side on the floor with his hand to his eye.

How they roared! Prize-fighters, Corinthians, prince, stable boy, and landlord were all shouting at the top of their lungs. Old Buckhorse was skipping about on a box beside me, shrieking out criticisms and advice in strange obsolete ring jargon, which no one could understand. His dull eyes were shining, his parchment face was quivering with excitement, and his strange musical call rang out above the hubbub. The two men were hurried to their corners, one second sponging them down and the other flapping a towel in front of their faces, while they, with arms hanging down and legs extended, tried to draw all the air they could into their lungs in the brief space allowed them.

“Where’s your country hawbuck now?” cried

Craven, triumphantly. "Did ever you witness anything more masterly?"

"He's no Johnny Raw, certainly," said Sir John, shaking his head.—"What odds are you giving on Berks, Lord Sele?"

"Two to one."

"I take you twice in hundreds."

"Here's Sir John Lade hedging!" cried my uncle, smiling back at us over his shoulder.

"Time!" said Jackson, and the two men sprang forward to the mark again.

This round was a good deal shorter than that which had preceded it. Berks's orders evidently were to close at any cost, and so make use of his extra weight and strength before the superior condition of his antagonist could have time to tell. On the other hand, Jim, after his experience in the last round, was less disposed to make any great exertion to keep him at arm's length. He led at Berks's head as he came rushing in and missed him, receiving a severe body blow in return, which left the imprint of four angry knuckles above his ribs. As they closed Jim caught his opponent's bullet head under his arm for an instant, and put a couple of half-arm blows in, but the prize-fighter pulled him over by his weight, and the two fell panting side by side upon the ground. Jim sprang up, however, and walked over to his corner, while Berks, distressed by his evening's dissipation, leaned one arm upon Mendoza and the other upon Dutch Sam, as he made for his seat.

"Bellows to mend!" cried Jem Belcher. "Where's the four to one now?"

"Give us time to get the lid off our pepper-box," said Mendoza. "We mean to make a night of it."

"Looks like it," cried Jack Harrison. "He's shut one of his eyes already. Even money that my boy wins it!"

"How much?" asked several voices.

"Two pound, four and threepence," cried Harrison, counting out all his worldly wealth.

"Time!" said Jackson once more.

They were both at the mark in an instant, Jim as full of sprightly confidence as ever, and Berks with a dogged grin upon his bulldog face, and a most vicious gleam in the only eye which was of use to him. His half-minute had not enabled him to recover his breath, and his huge hairy chest was rising and falling with a quick, loud panting like a spent hound. "Go in, boy! Bustle him!" roared Harrison and Belcher.—"Get your wind, Joe, get your wind!" cried the Jews. So now we had a reversal of tactics, for it was Jim who went in to hit with all the vigour of his young strength and unimpaired energy, while it was the savage Berks who was paying his debt to Nature for the many injuries which he had done her. He gasped, he gurgled, his face grew purple in his attempts to get his breath, while with his long left arm extended and his right thrown across he tried to screen himself from the attack of his young antagonist. "Drop when he hits!" cried Mendoza, "drop and have a rest."

But there was no shyness or shiftiness about Berks's fighting. He was always a gallant ruffian who disdained to go down before an antagonist as long as his legs would sustain him. He propped Jim off with his long arm, and though the lad sprang lightly round him, looking for an opening, he was held off as if a forty-inch bar of iron were between them. Every instant now was in favour of Berks, and already his breathing was easier and the bluish tinge fading from his face. Jim knew that his chance of a speedy victory was slipping away from him, and he came back again and again as swift as a flash to the attack without being able to get past the passive defence of the trained fighting man. It was at such a moment that ringcraft was needed, and, luckily for Jim, two masters of it were at his back. "Get your left on his mark, boy!" they shouted. "Then go to his head with the right!"

Jim heard, and acted on the instant. Plunk! came his left just where his antagonist's ribs curved from his breastbone. The force of the blow was half broken by Berks's elbow, but it served its purpose of bringing forward his head. Spank! went the right, with the clear, crisp sound of two billiard balls clapping together, and Berks reeled, flung up his arms, spun round, and fell in a huge, fleshy heap upon the floor. His seconds were on him instantly, and propped him up in a sitting position, his head rolling helplessly from one shoulder to the other, and finally toppling backward with his chin pointed to the ceiling. Dutch Sam thrust the brandy bladder between his teeth, while Mendoza shook him savagely and howled insults in his ear, but neither the spirits nor the sense of injury could break into that serene tranquillity. Time was duly called, and the Jews, seeing that the affair was over, let their man's head fall back with a crack upon the floor, and there he lay, his huge arms and legs a-sprawl, while the Corinthians and fighting men crowded past him to shake the hand of his conqueror.

For my part I tried also to pass through the throng, but it was no easy task for one of the smallest and weakest men in the room. On all sides of me I heard a brisk discussion from amateurs and professionals of Jim's performance and of his prospects.

"He's the best bit of new stuff that I've seen since Jem Belcher fought his first fight with Paddington Jones at Wormwood Scrubs four years ago last April," said Berkeley Craven. "You'll see him with the belt round his waist before he's five and twenty, or I am no judge of a man."

"That handsome face of his has cost me a cool five hundred," grumbled Sir John Lade. "Who'd have thought that he was such a punishing hitter?"

"For all that," said another, "I am confident that if Joe Berks had been sober he would have eaten him. Besides, the lad was in training, and the other would have burst like an overdone potato if he were hit. I never saw a man so soft, or with his wind in such a condition. Put the men in training, and it's a horse to a hen on the bruiser."

Some agreed with the last speaker, and some were against him, so that a brisk argument was being carried on around me. In the midst of it the prince took his departure, which was the signal for the greater part of the company to make for the door. In this way I was able at last to reach the corner where Jim had just finished his dressing, while Champion Harrison, with tears of joy still shining upon his cheeks, was helping him on with his overcoat.

"In four rounds!" he kept repeating, in a sort of ecstasy. "Joe Berks in four rounds! And it took Jem Belcher fourteen."

"Well, Roddy," cried Jim, holding out his hand, "I told you that I would come to London and make my name known."

"It was splendid, Jim!"

"Dear old Roddy! I saw your white face staring at me from the corner. You are not changed for all your grand clothes and your London friends."

"It is you who are changed, Jim," said I. "I hardly knew you when you came into the room."

"Nor I," cried the smith. "Where got you all these fine feathers, Jim? Sure I am that it was not your aunt that helped you to the first step toward the prize ring."

"Miss Hinton has been my friend—the best friend I ever had."

"Humph! I thought as much," grumbled the smith. "Well, it is no doing of mine, Jim, and you must bear witness to that when we go home again. I don't know what—but there, it is done, and it can't be helped. After all, she's—now the devil take my clumsy tongue!"

I could not tell whether it was the wine he had taken at supper or the excitement of Boy Jim's victory which was affecting Champion Harrison, but his usually placid face wore a most disturbed expression, and his manner seemed to betray an alternation of exultation and embarrassment. Jim looked curiously at him, wondering evidently what it was that lay behind these abrupt sentences and sudden silences. The coach house had in the meanwhile been cleared, Berks with many curses had staggered at last to his feet and had gone off in the company of two other bruisers, while Jem Belcher alone remained chatting very earnestly with my uncle.

"Very good, Belcher," I heard my uncle say.

"It would be a real pleasure to me to do it, sir," said the famous prize-fighter, as the two walked toward us.

"I wished to ask you, Jim Harrison, whether you would undertake to be my champion in the fight against Crab Wilson, of Gloucester," said my uncle.

"That is what I want, Sir Charles—to have a chance of fighting my way upward."

"There are heavy stakes upon the event—very heavy stakes," said my uncle. "You will receive two hundred pounds if you win. Does that satisfy you?"

"I shall fight for the honour, and because I wish to be thought worthy of being matched against Jem Belcher."

Belcher laughed good-humouredly.

"You're going the right way about it, lad," said he. "But you had a soft thing on to-night, with a drunken man who was out of condition."

"I did not wish to fight him," said Jim, flushing.

"Oh, I know you have spirit enough to fight anything on two legs. I knew that the instant I clapped eyes on you. But I want you to remember that when you fight Crab Wilson you will fight the most promising man from the west, and that the best man of the west is likely to be the best man in England. He's as quick and as long in the reach as you are, and he'll train himself to the last half ounce of tallow. I tell you this now, d'ye see, because if I'm to have the charge of you——"

"Charge of me!"

"Yes!" said my uncle. "Belcher has consented to train you for the coming battle if you are willing to enter."

"I am sure I am very much obliged to you," cried Jim, heartily. "Unless my uncle should wish to train me, there's no one I would rather have."

"Nay, Jim. I'll stay with you a few days, but Belcher knows a deal more about training than I do. Where will the quarters be?"

"I thought it would be handy for you if we fixed it at the George at Crawley. Then if we have the choice of place we might choose Crawley Down, for, except Moseley Hurst, and maybe Smitham Bottom, there isn't a spot in the country that would compare with it for a mill. Do you agree to that?"

"With all my heart," said Jim.

"Then you're my man from this hour on, d'ye see?" said Belcher. "Your food is mine and your drink is mine and your sleep is mine, and all you've to do is just what you are told. We haven't an hour to lose, for Wilson has been in half training this month back. You saw his empty glass to-night?"

"Jim's fit to fight for his life at the present moment," said Harrison. "But we'll both come down with you to Crawley to-morrow. So good night, Sir Charles."

"Good night, Roddy," said Jim. "You'll come down to Crawley and see me at my training quarters, will you not?" And I heartily promised that I would.

"You must be more careful, nephew," said my uncle, as we rattled home in his model vis-à-vis. "In première jeunesse one is a little inclined to be ruled by one's heart rather than one's reason. Jim Harrison seems to be a most respectable young fellow, but, after all, he is a blacksmith's apprentice and a candidate for the prize ring. There is a vast gap between his position and that of my own blood relation, and you must let him feel that you are his superior."

"He is the oldest and dearest friend that I have in the world, sir," I answered. "We were boys together, and have never had a secret from each other. As to showing him that I am his superior, I don't know how I can do that, for I know very well that he is mine."

"Hum!" said my uncle dryly, and it was the last word that he addressed to me that night.

CHAPTER XII.

THE COFFEE ROOM OF FLADONG'S.

So Boy Jim went down to the George at Crawley under the charge of Jem Belcher and his uncle to train for his great fight with Crab Wilson, of Gloucester, while every club and bar parlour of London rang with the account of how he had appeared at a supper of Corinthians and beaten the formidable Joe Berks in four rounds. Jim had told me that he would make his name known, and his words had come true sooner than he could have expected it, for go where one might, one heard of nothing but the match between Sir Lothian Hume and Sir Charles Tregellis and the points of the two probable combatants. The betting was still strongly in favour of Wilson, for he had a number of bye-battles to set against this single victory of Jim's, and it was thought by connoisseurs who had seen him spar that the singular defensive tactics which had given him his nickname would prove very puzzling to a raw antagonist. In height, strength, and reputation for gameness there was very little to choose between them, but Wilson had been the more severely tested.

It was but a few days before the battle that my father made his promised visit to London. The seaman had no love for cities, and was happier when wandering over the Downs, and turning his glass upon every topsail which showed above the horizon, than in finding his way among crowded streets, where, as he complained, it was impossible to keep a course by the sun, and very hard by dead reckoning. Rumours of war were in the air, however, and it was necessary that he should use his influence with Lord Nelson if a vacancy was to be found either for himself or for me.

My uncle had just set forth, as was his custom of an evening, clad in his green riding frock, his plate buttons, his Cordovan boots, and his round hat, to show himself upon his little crop-tailed tit in the Mall. I had remained behind, for, indeed, I had already made up my mind that I had no calling for this fashionable life. These men, with their small waists, their gestures, and their unnatural ways, had become wearisome to me, and even my uncle, with his cold and patronizing manner, filled me with very mixed feelings. My thoughts were back in Sussex, and I was dreaming of the kindly, simple ways of the country, when there came a rat-tat at the knocker, the ring of a hearty voice, and there in the doorway was the smiling, weather-beaten face, with the puckered eyelids and the light blue eyes.

“Why, Roddy, you are grand, indeed!” he cried. “But I had rather see you with the king’s blue coat upon your back than with all these frills and ruffles.”

“And I had rather wear it, father,” I answered.

“It makes me glad to hear you say so. Lord Nelson had promised me that he would find a berth for you, and to-morrow we shall seek him out and remind him of it. But where is your uncle?”

“He is riding in the Mall.”

A look of relief passed over my father’s honest face, for he was never very easy in his brother-in-law’s company. “I have been to the admiralty,” said he, “and I trust that I shall have a ship when war breaks out; by all accounts it will not be long first. Lord St. Vincent told me so with his own lips. But I am at Fladong’s, Rodney, where, if you will come and sup with me, you will see some of my messmates from the Mediterranean.”

When you think that in the last year of the war we had one hundred and forty thousand seamen and marines afloat, commanded by four thousand officers, and that half of these had been turned adrift when the Peace of Amiens laid their ships up in the Hamoaze or Portsdown Creek, you will understand that London, as well as the dockyard towns, was full of seafarers. You could not walk the streets without catching sight of gipsy-faced, keen-eyed men, whose plain clothes told of their empty purses as plainly as their listless air showed their weariness of a life of forced and unaccustomed inaction. Amid the dark streets and brick houses there was something out of place in their appearance, as when the seagulls, driven by stress of weather, are seen in the midland shires. Yet, while prize courts procrastinated, or there was a chance of an appointment by showing their sunburned faces at the admiralty, so long they would continue to pace, with their quarter-deck strut, down Whitehall, or to gather of an evening to discuss the events of the last war or the chances of the next at Fladong's in Oxford Street, which was reserved as entirely for the navy as Slaughter's was for the army or Ibbetson's for the Church of England.

It did not surprise me, therefore, that we should find the large room in which we supped crowded with naval men, but I remember that what did cause me some astonishment was to observe that all these sailors who had served under the most varying conditions, in all quarters of the globe, from the Baltic to the West Indies, should have been moulded into so uniform a type that they were more like each other than brother is commonly to brother. The rules of the service insured that every face should be clean-shaven, every head powdered, and every neck covered by the little queue of natural hair, tied with a black silk ribbon. Biting winds and tropical suns had combined to darken them, while the habit of command and the menace of ever-recurring dangers had stamped them all with the same expression of authority and alertness. There were some jovial faces among them, but the older officers, with their deep-lined cheeks and their masterful noses, were for the most part as austere as so many weather-beaten ascetics from the desert. Lonely watchers and a discipline which cut them off from all companionship had left their mark upon those red-Indian faces. For my part, I could hardly eat my supper for watching them. Young as I was, I knew that if there were any freedom left in Europe, it was to these men that we owed it, and I seemed to read upon their grim, harsh features the record of that long ten years of struggle which had swept the tricolor from the seas.

When we had finished our supper my father led me into the great coffee room, where one hundred or more officers may have been assembled, drinking their wine and smoking their long clay pipes, until the air was as thick as the main deck in a close-fought action.

“There’s many a man here, Rodney,” said my father, as he glanced about him, “whose name may never find its way into any book save his own ship’s log, but who in his own way has set as fine an example as any admiral of them all. We know them and talk of them in the fleet, though they may never be bawled in the streets of London. There’s as much seamanship and pluck in a good cutter action as in a line-o’-battle ship fight, though you may not come by a title or the thanks of Parliament for it. There’s Hamilton, for example, the quiet, pale-faced man who is leaning against the pillar. It was he who with six rowing boats cut out the forty-four-gun frigate Hermione from under the muzzles of two hundred shore guns in the harbour of Puerto Cabello. No finer action was done in the whole war. There’s Brereton, with the whiskers. It was he who attacked twelve Spanish gunboats in his own little brig, and made four of them strike to him. There's Walker, of the Rose cutter, who with thirteen men engaged three French privateers, with crews of a hundred and forty-six. He sank one, captured one, and chased the third.—How are you, Captain Bell? I hope I see you well.”

Two or three of my father's acquaintances, who had been sitting close by, drew up their chairs to us, and soon quite a circle had formed, all talking loudly and arguing upon sea matters, shaking their long, red-tipped pipes at each other as they spoke. My father whispered in my ear that his neighbour was Captain Foley, of the Goliath, who led the van at the Nile, and that the tall, thin, foxy-haired man opposite was Lord Cochrane, the most dashing frigate captain in the service. Even at Friar's Oak we had heard how in the little Speedy of fourteen small guns, with fifty-four men, he had carried by boarding the Spanish frigate Gamo with her crew of three hundred. It was easy to see that he was a quick, irascible man, for he was talking hotly about his grievances with a flush of anger upon his freckled cheeks.

It was of interest to me to hear these men who were spending their lives in fighting against our neighbours discussing their character and ways. You can not conceive—you who live in times of peace and charity—how fierce the hatred was in England at that time against the French, and above all against their great leader. It was more than a mere prejudice or dislike. It was a deep, aggressive loathing which you may even now form some conception of if you examine the papers or caricatures of the day. The word Frenchman was hardly spoken without “rascal” or “scoundrel” slipping in before it. In all ranks of life and in every part of the country the feeling was the same. Even the Jacks aboard our ships fought with a viciousness against a French vessel which they would never show to Dane, Dutchman, or Spaniard.

If you ask me now after fifty years why it was that there should have been this virulent feeling against them, so foreign to the easy-going and tolerant British nature, I would confess that I think the real reason was fear. Not fear of them individually, of course—our foulest detractors have never called us faint-hearted—but fear of their star, fear of their future, fear of the subtle brain whose plans always seemed to go aright, and of the heavy hand which had struck nation after nation to the ground. We were but a small country with a population which, when the war began, was not much more than half that of France. And then France had increased by leaps and bounds, reaching out to the north into Belgium and Holland, and to the south into Italy, while we were weakened by deep-lying disaffection among both Catholics and Presbyterians in Ireland. The danger was imminent and plain to the least thoughtful. One could not walk the Kent coast without seeing the beacons heaped up to tell the country of the enemy's landing, and if the sun was shining on the uplands near Boulogne one might catch a glimpse of its gleam upon the bayonets of manœuvring veterans. No wonder that a fear of the French power lay deeply in the hearts of the most gallant men, and that fear should, as it always does, beget a bitter and rancorous hatred.

The seamen did not speak kindly of their recent enemies. Their hearts loathed them, and, in the fashion of their country, their lips said what their hearts felt. Of the French officers they could not have spoken with more chivalry as of worthy foemen, but the nation was an abomination to them. The older men had fought against them in the American war, they had fought again for the last ten years, and the dearest wish of their hearts seemed to be that they might be called upon to do the same for the remainder of their days. Yet if I were surprised by the virulence of their animosity against the French, I was even more so to hear how highly they rated them as antagonists. The long succession of British victories, which had finally made the French take to their ports and resign the struggle in despair, had given all of us the idea that for some reason a Briton on the water must, in the nature of things, always have the best of it against a Frenchman.

But these men who had done the fighting did not think so. They were loud in their praise of their foeman's gallantry, and precise in their reasons for his defeat. They showed how the officers of the old French navy had nearly all been aristocrats, and how the revolution had swept them out of their ships and the force been left with insubordinate seamen and no competent leaders. This ill-directed fleet had been hustled into port by the pressure of the well-manned and well-commanded British, who had pinned them there ever since, so that they had never had an opportunity for learning seamanship. Their harbour drill and their harbour gunnery had been of no service when sails had to be trimmed and broadsides fired on the heave of an Atlantic swell. Let one of their frigates get to sea and have a couple of years free run in which to learn her duties, and then it would be a feather in the cap of a British officer if, with a ship of equal force, he could bring down her colours.

Such were the views of these experienced officers, fortified by many reminiscences and examples of French gallantry, such as the way in which the crew of L'Orient had fought her quarter-deck guns when the maindeck was in a blaze beneath them, and when they must have known that they were standing over an exploding magazine. The general hope was that the West Indian expedition, since the peace, might have given many of their fleet an ocean training, and that they might be tempted out into mid-channel if the war were to break out afresh. But would it break out afresh? We had spent gigantic sums and made enormous exertions to curb the power of Napoleon and to prevent him from becoming the universal despot of the world. Would the Government try it again? Or were they appalled by the gigantic load of debt which must bend the backs of many generations unborn? Pitt was there, and surely he was not a man to leave his work half done!

And then suddenly there was a bustle at the door. Amid the gray swirl of the tobacco smoke I could catch a glimpse of a blue coat and gold epaulets, with a crowd gathering thickly around them, while a hoarse murmur arose from the group, which thickened into a deep-chested cheer. Every one was on his feet, peering and asking each other what it might mean. And still the crowd seethed and the cheering swelled.

“What is it? What has happened?” cried a score of voices.

“Put him up! Hoist him up!” shouted somebody, and an instant later I saw an officer appear above the shoulders of the crowd. His face was flushed, and he was waving what seemed to be a letter in the air. The cheering died away, and there was such a hush that I could hear the crackle of the paper in his hand.

“Great news, gentlemen!” he roared. “Glorious news! Rear-Admiral Collingwood has directed me to communicate it to you. The French ambassador has received his papers to-night. Every ship on the list is to go into commission. Admiral Cornwallis is ordered out of Cawsand Bay, to cruise off Ushant. A squadron is starting for the North Sea and another for the Irish Channel!”

He may have had more to say, but his audience could wait no longer. How they shouted and stamped and raved in their delight! Harsh old flag officers, grave post captains, young lieutenants, all were roaring like schoolboys breaking up for the holidays. There was no thought now of those manifold and weary grievances to which I had listened. The foul weather was passed, and the landlocked seabirds would be out on the foam once more. The rhythm of "God save the King!" swelled through the babel, and I heard the old lines sung in a way that made you forget their bad rhymes and their bald sentiments. I trust that you will never hear them so sung, with tears upon rugged cheeks, and catchings of the breath from strong men. Dark days will have come again before you hear such a song or see such a sight as that. Let those talk of the phlegm of our countrymen who have never seen them when the lava crust of restraint is broken, and when for an instant the strong enduring fires of the north glow upon the surface. I saw them then, and if I do not see them now I am not so old or so foolish as to doubt that they are there.

CHAPTER XIII.

LORD NELSON.

MY father's appointment with Lord Nelson was an early one, and he was the more anxious to be punctual as he knew how much the admiral's movements must be affected by the news which he had heard the night before. I had hardly breakfasted then and my uncle had not yet rung for his chocolate when he called for me at Jermyn Street. A walk of a few hundred yards brought us to the high building of discoloured brick in Piccadilly, which served the Hamiltons as a town house, and which Nelson used as his headquarters when business or pleasure called him from Merton. A footman answered our knock, and we were ushered into a large drawing room with sombre furniture and melancholy curtains. My father sent in his name and there we sat, looking at the white Italian statuettes in the corners, and the large picture of Vesuvius and the Bay of Naples, which hung over the harpsichord. I can remember that a black clock was ticking loudly upon the mantelpiece, and that every now and then amid the rumble of the hackney coaches we could hear boisterous laughter from some inner chamber.

When at last the door opened both my father and I sprang to our feet, thinking to find ourselves face to face with the greatest living Englishman. It was a very different person, however, who swept into the room.

She was a lady, tall, and, as it seemed to me, exceedingly beautiful, though perhaps one who was more experienced and more critical might have thought that her charm lay in the past rather than in the present. Her queenly figure was moulded upon large and noble lines, while her face, though already tending to become somewhat heavy and coarse, was still remarkable for the brilliancy of the complexion, the beauty of the large, light blue eyes, and the tinge of the dark hair, which curled over the low, white forehead. She carried herself in the most stately fashion, so that as I looked at her majestic entrance, and at the pose which she struck as she glanced at my father, I was reminded of the Queen of the Peruvians, as, in the person of Miss Hinton, she incited Boy Jim and myself to insurrection.

“Lieutenant Anson Stone?” she asked.

“Yes, your ladyship,” answered my father.

“Ah!” she cried, with an affected and exaggerated start. “You know me, then?”

“I have seen your ladyship at Naples.”

“Then you have doubtless seen my poor Sir William also—my poor, poor Sir William!” She touched her dress with her white ring-covered fingers, as if to draw our attention to the fact that she was in the deepest mourning.

“I heard of your ladyship’s sad loss,” said my father.

“We died together,” she cried. “What can my life be now save a long-drawn, living death?” She spoke in a beautiful, rich voice, with the most heartbroken thrill in it, but I could not conceal from myself that she appeared to be one of the most robust persons that I had ever seen, and I was surprised to notice that she shot arch little questioning glances at me, as if the admiration of even so insignificant a person were of some interest to her. My father, in his blunt sailor fashion, tried to stammer out some commonplace condolence, but her eyes swept past his rude, weather-beaten face to ask and reask what effect she had made upon me.

“There he hangs, the tutelary angel of this house," she cried, pointing with a grand, sweeping gesture to the painting upon the wall, which represented a very thin-faced, high-nosed gentleman with several orders upon his coat. "But enough of my private sorrow!" She dashed invisible tears from her eyes. "You have come to see Lord Nelson. He bid me say that he would be with you in an instant. You have doubtless heard that hostilities are about to reopen."

"We heard the news last night."

"Lord Nelson is under orders to take command of the Mediterranean fleet. You can think that at such a moment— But, ah! is it not his lordship's step that I hear?"

My attention was so riveted by the lady's curious manner and by the gestures and attitudes with which she accompanied every remark that I did not see the great admiral enter the room. When I turned he was standing close by my elbow—a small, brown man, with the lithe, slim figure of a boy. He was not clad in uniform, but he wore a high-collared brown coat with the right arm hanging limp and empty by his side. The expression of his face was, as I remember it, exceedingly sad and gentle, with the deep lines upon it which told of the chafing of his urgent and fiery soul. One eye was disfigured and sightless from a wound, but the other looked from my father to myself with the quickest and shrewdest of expressions. Indeed, his whole manner, with his short, sharp glance and his fine poise of the head, spoke of energy and alertness, so that he reminded me, if I may compare great things with small, of a well-bred fighting terrier, gentle and slim, but keen and ready for whatever chance might send.

“Why, Lieutenant Stone,” said he, with great cordiality, holding out his left hand to my father, “I am very glad to see you. London is full of Mediterranean men, but I trust that in a week there will not be an officer among you all with his feet on dry land.”

“I had come to ask you, sir, if you could assist me to a ship.”

“You shall have one, Stone, if my word goes for anything at the admiralty. I shall want all my old Nile men at my back. I can not promise you a first-rate, but at least it shall be a sixty-four-gunship, and I can tell you that there is much to be done with a handy, well-manned, well-found sixty-four-gunship.”

“Who could doubt it who has heard of the Agamemnon?” cried Lady Hamilton, and straightway she began to talk of the admiral and of his doings with such extravagance of praise and such a shower of compliments and of epithets that my father and I did not know which way to look, feeling shame and sorrow for a man who was compelled to listen to such things said in his own presence. But when I ventured to glance at Lord Nelson I found to my surprise that, far from showing any embarrassment, he was smiling with pleasure, as if this gross flattery of her ladyship's were the dearest thing in all the world to him.

"Come, come, my dear lady," said he, "you speak vastly beyond my merits," upon which encouragement she started again in a theatrical apostrophe to Britain's darling and Neptune's eldest son, which he endured with the same signs of gratitude and pleasure. That a man of the world, forty-five years of age, shrewd, honest, and acquainted with courts, should be beguiled by such a crude and coarse homage amazed me, as it did all who knew him, but you who have seen much of life do not need to be told how often the strongest and noblest nature has its one inexplicable weakness, showing up the more obviously in contrast to the rest, as the dark stain looks the foulest upon the whitest sheet. "You are a sea officer of my own heart, Stone," said he, when her ladyship had exhausted her panegyric. "You are one of the old breed." He walked up and down the room with little impatient steps as he talked, turning with a whisk upon his heel every now and then as if some invisible rail had brought him up. "We are getting too fine for our work with these new-fangled epaulets and quarter-deck trimmings. When I joined the service you would find a lieutenant gammoning and rigging his own bowsprit, or aloft, maybe, with a marlin-spike slung round his neck, showing an example to his men. Now it's as much as he'll do to carry his own sextant up the companion. When could you join?"

"To-night, my lord."

"Right, Stone, right! That is the true spirit. They are working double tides in the yards, but I do not know when the ships will be ready. I hoist my flag on the Victory on Wednesday, and we sail at once."

"No, no; not so soon! She can not be ready for sea," said Lady Hamilton, in a wailing voice, clasping her hands and turning up her eyes as she spoke.

"She must and she shall be ready," cried Nelson, with extraordinary vehemence. "By Heaven, if the devil stands at the door I sail on Wednesday! Who knows what these rascals may be doing in my absence? It maddens me to think of the deviltries which they may be devising. At this very instant, dear lady, the queen, our queen, may be straining her eyes for the topsails of Nelson's ships."

"Well, she knows that her stainless knight will never fail her in her need," said Lady Hamilton.

Thinking as I did that they were speaking of our own old Queen Charlotte, I could make no meaning out of this, but my father told me afterward that both Nelson and Lady Hamilton had conceived an extraordinary affection for the Queen of Naples, and that it was the interests of her little kingdom which he had so strenuously at heart. It may have been my expression of bewilderment which attracted Nelson's attention to me, for he suddenly stopped in his quick quarter-deck walk and looked me up and down with a severe eye.

"Well, young gentleman!" said he, sharply.

"This is my only son, sir," said my father. "It is my wish that he should join the service, if a berth can be found for him, for we have all been king's officers for many generations."

"So you wish to come and have your bones broken," cried Nelson, roughly, looking with much disfavour at the fine clothes which had cost my uncle and Mr. Brummel such a debate. "You will have to change that grand coat for a tarry jacket if you serve under me, sir."

I was so embarrassed by the abruptness of his manner that I could but stammer out that I hoped that I should do my duty, on which his stern mouth relaxed into a good-humoured smile, and he laid his little brown hand for an instant upon my shoulder.

“I dare say that you will do very well,” said he. “I can see that you have the stuff in you. But do not imagine that it is a light service which you undertake, young gentleman, when you enter his Majesty’s navy. It is a hard profession. You hear of the few who succeed, but what do you know of the hundreds who never find their way? Look at my own luck! Out of two hundred who were with me in the St. Juan expedition, one hundred and forty-five died in a single night. I have been in one hundred and eighty engagements, and I have, as you see, lost my eye and my arm, and been sorely wounded besides. It chanced that I came through, and here I am flying my admiral’s flag, but I remember many a man as good as me who did not come through. Yes,” he added, as her ladyship broke in with voluble protest, “many and many as good a man who has gone to the sharks or the land-crabs. But it is a useless sailor who does not risk himself every day, and the lives of all of us are in the hands of Him who best knows when to claim them."

For an instant, in his earnest gaze and reverent manner, we seemed to catch a glimpse of the deeper, truer Nelson, the man of the eastern counties, deeply steeped in the virile Puritanism which sent from that district the Ironsides to fashion England within, and the Pilgrim fathers to spread it without. Here was the Nelson who declared that he saw the hand of God pressing upon the French, and who waited on his knees in the cabin of his flagship while she bore down upon the enemy's line. There was a human tenderness, too, in his way of speaking of his dead comrades, which made me understand why it was that he was so beloved by all who served with him, for, iron-hard as he was as seaman and fighter, there ran through his complex nature a sweet and un-English power of affectionate emotion, showing itself in tears, if he were moved, and in such tender impulses as led him afterward to ask his flag captain to kiss him as he lay dying in the cockpit of the Victory. My father had risen to depart, but the admiral, with that kindness which he ever showed to the young, and which had been momentarily chilled by the unfortunate splendour of my clothes, still passed up and down in front of us, shooting out crisp little sentences of exhortations and advice.

“It is ardour that we need in the service, young gentleman,” said he. “We need red-hot men who will never rest satisfied. We had them in the Mediterranean, and we shall have them again. There was a band of brothers! When I was asked to recommend one for special service I told the admiralty they might take the names as they came, for the same spirit animated them all. Had we taken nineteen vessels we should never have said it was well done while the twentieth sailed the seas. You know how it was with us, Stone. You are too old a Mediterranean man for me to tell you anything.”

“I trust, my lord, that I shall be with you when next we meet them,” said my father.

“Meet them we shall and must. By Heaven, I shall never rest until I have given them a shaking! The scoundrel Bonaparte wishes to humble us. Let him try, and God help the better cause!” He spoke with such extraordinary animation that the empty sleeve flapped about in the air, giving him the strangest appearance. Seeing my eyes fixed upon it, he turned with a smile to my father.

“I can still work my fin, Stone,” said he, putting his hand across to the stump of his arm. “What used they to say in the fleet about it?”

“That it was a sign, sir, that it was a bad time to cross your hawse.”

“They knew me, the rascals! You can see, young gentleman, that not a scrap of the ardour with which I serve my country has been shot away. Some day you may find that you are flying your own flag, and when that time comes you may remember that my advice to an officer is that he should have nothing to do with tame, slow measures. Lay all your stake, and if you lose through no fault of your own, the country will find you another stake as large. Never mind manœuvres! Go for them! The only manœuvre you need is that which will place you alongside your enemy. Always fight, and you will always be right. Give not a thought to your own ease or your own life, for from the day that you draw the blue coat over your shoulders you have no life of your own. It is the country’s, to be most freely spent if the smallest gain can come from it.—How is the wind this morning, Stone?”

“East-southeast,” my father answered readily.

“Then Cornwallis is doubtless keeping well up to Brest, though for my own I had rather tempt them out into the open sea.”

“That is what every officer and man in the fleet would prefer, your lordship,” said my father.

“They do not love the blockading service, and it is little wonder, since neither money nor honour is to be gained by it. You can remember how it was in the winter months before Toulon, Stone, when we had neither firing, beef, pork, nor flour aboard the ship, nor a spare piece of rope, canvas, or twine. We braced the old hulks with our spare cables, and God knows there was never a Levanter that I did not expect it to send us to the bottom! But we held our grip all the same. Yet I fear that we do not get much credit for it here in England, Stone, where they light the windows for a great battle, but they do not understand that it is easier for us to fight the Nile six times over than to keep our station all winter in the blockade. But I pray God that we may meet this new fleet of theirs and settle the matter by a pell-mell battle!"

"May I be with you, my lord!" said my father, earnestly. "But we have already taken too much of your time, and so I beg to thank you for your kindness, and to wish you good morning."

"Good morning, Stone!" said Nelson. "You shall have your ship, and if I can make this young gentleman one of my officers it shall be done. But I gather from his dress," he continued, running his eye over me, "that you have been more fortunate in prize money than most of your comrades. For my own part I never did nor could turn my thoughts to money-making."

My father explained that I had been under the charge of the famous Sir Charles Tregellis, who was my uncle, and with whom I was now residing.

"Then you need no help from me," said Nelson, with some bitterness. "If you have either guineas or interest you can climb over the heads of old sea officers, though you may not know the poop from the galley, or a carronade from a long nine. Nevertheless— But what in the devil have we here?"

The footman had suddenly precipitated himself into the room, but stood abashed before the fierce glare of the admiral's eye.

"Your lordship told me to rush to you with it if it should come," he explained, holding out a large blue envelope.

"By Heaven, it is my orders!" cried Nelson, snatching it up and fumbling with it in his awkward, one-handed attempt to break the seals. Lady Hamilton ran to his assistance, but no sooner had she glanced at the paper inclosed than she burst into a shrill scream, and, throwing up her hands and her eyes, she sank backward in a swoon. I could not but observe, however, that her fall was very carefully executed, and that she was fortunate enough, in spite of her insensibility, to arrange her drapery and attitude into a graceful and classical design. But he, the honest seaman, so incapable of deceit or affectation that he could not suspect it in others, ran madly to the bell, shouting for the maid, the doctor, and the smelling salts, with incoherent words of grief and such passionate terms of emotion that my father thought it more discreet to twitch me by the sleeve as a signal that we should steal out of the room. There we left him, then, in the dim-lit London drawing room, beside himself with pity for this shallow and most artificial woman, while without, at the edge of the Piccadilly curb, there stood the high dark berlin which was ready to start him upon that long journey, which was to end in his chase of the French fleet over seven thousand miles of ocean, his meeting with it, his victory which confined Napoleon's ambition forever to the land, and his death, coming, as I would it might come to all of us, at the crowning moment of his life.

CHAPTER XIV.

ON THE ROAD.

AND now the day of the great fight began to approach. Even the imminent outbreak of war and the threats of Napoleon were secondary things in the eyes of the sportsmen—and the sportsmen in those days made a large half of the population. In the club of the Patrician and the Plebeian gin shop, in the coffee house of the merchant, or the barrack room of the soldier in London or the provinces, the same question was interesting the whole nation. Every west-country coach brought up word of the fine condition of Crab Wilson, who had returned to his own native air for his training, and was known to be under the care of Captain Barclay the expert. On the other hand, although my uncle had not yet formally named his man, there was no doubt among the public that Jim was to be his nominee, and the report of his physique and of his performance found him many backers. On the whole, however, the betting remained in favour of Wilson, for Bristol and the west country stood by him to a man, while London opinion was divided. Three to two were to be had at any West End club two days before the battle.

I had twice been down to Crawley to see Jim in his training quarters, where I found him undergoing the severe regimen which was usual. From early dawn until nightfall he was running, jumping, striking a bladder which swung from a bar, or sparring with his formidable trainer. His eyes shone and his skin glowed with exuberant health, and he was so confident of success that my own misgivings vanished as I watched his gallant bearing and listened to his quiet and cheerful words.

“But I wonder that you should come and see me now, Roddy,” said he when we parted, trying to laugh as he spoke. “I have become a bruiser, and your uncle’s paid man, while you are a Corinthian upon town. If you had not been the best and truest little gentleman in the world, you would have been my patron instead of my friend before now.”

When I looked at this splendid fellow, with his high-bred, clean-cut face, and thought of the fine qualities and gentle, generous impulses which I knew to lie within him, it seemed so absurd that he should speak as though my friendship toward him were a condescension that I could not help laughing aloud.

“That is all very well, Rodney,” said he, looking hard into my eyes. “But what does your uncle think about it?”

This was a poser, and I could only answer lamely enough that, much as I was indebted to my uncle, I had known Jim first, and that I was surely old enough to choose my own friends.

Jim's misgivings were so far correct that my uncle did very strongly object to any intimacy between us, but there were so many other points in which he disapproved of my conduct that it made the less difference. I fear that he was already disappointed in me. I would not develop an eccentricity, although he was good enough to point out several by which I might come out of the ruck, as he expressed it, and so catch the attention of the strange world in which he lived.

“You are an active young fellow, nephew,” said he. “Do you not think that you could engage to climb round the furniture of an ordinary room without setting foot upon the ground? Some little tour de force of the sort is in excellent taste. There was a captain in the Guards who attained considerable social success by doing it for a small wager. Lady Lievan, who is exceedingly exigent, used to invite him to her evenings merely that he might exhibit it."

I had to assure him that the feat would be beyond me.

"You are just a little difficile," said he, shrugging his shoulders. "As my nephew, you might have taken your position by perpetuating my delicacy of taste. If you had made le mauvais gout your enemy, the world of fashion would willingly have looked upon you as an arbiter by virtue of your family traditions, and you might, without a struggle, have stepped into the position to which this young upstart Brummel aspires. But you have no instinct in that direction. You are incapable of minute attention to detail. Look at your shoes! Look at your cravat! Look at your watch-chain! Two links are enough to show. I have shown three, but it was an indiscretion. At this moment I can see no less than five of yours. I regret it, nephew, but I do not think that you are destined to attain that position which I have a right to expect from my blood relation."

"I am sorry to be a disappointment to you, sir," said I.

"It is your misfortune not to have come under my influence earlier," said he. "I might then have moulded you so as to have satisfied even my own aspirations. I had a younger brother whose case was a similar one. I did what I could for him, but he would wear ribbons in his shoes, and he publicly mistook white Burgundy for Rhine wine. Eventually the poor fellow took to books and lived and died in a country vicarage. He was a good man, but he was commonplace, and there is no place in society for commonplace people."

"Then I fear, sir, that there is none for me," said I. "But my father has every hope that Lord Nelson will find me a position in the fleet. If I have been a failure in town I am none the less conscious of your kindness in trying to advance my interests, and I hope that should I receive my commission I may be a credit to you yet."

"It is possible that you may attain that very spot which I had marked out for you, but by another road," said my uncle. "There are many men in town, such as Lord St. Vincent, Lord Hood, and others, who move in the most respectable circles, although they have nothing but their services in the navy to recommend them."

It was on the afternoon of the day before the fight that this conversation took place between my uncle and myself in the dainty sanctum of his Jermyn Street house. He was clad, I remember, in his flowing brocade dressing gown, as was his custom before he set out for his club, and his foot was extended upon a stool, for Abernethy had just been in to treat him from an incipient attack of the gout. It may have been the pain, or it may have been his disappointment at my career, but his manner was more testy than was usual with him, and I fear that there was something of a sneer in his smile as he spoke of my deficiencies.

For my own part I was relieved at the explanation, for my father had left London in the full conviction that a vacancy would be speedily found for us both, and the one thing which had weighed upon my mind was that I might have found it hard to leave my uncle without interfering with the plans which he had formed. I was heart-weary of this empty life, for which I was so ill-fashioned, and weary also of that intolerant talk which would make a coterie of frivolous women and foolish fops the central point of the universe. Something of my uncle's sneer may have flickered upon my lips as I heard him allude with supercilious surprise to the presence in those sacro-sanct circles of the men who had stood between the country and destruction.

“By the way, nephew,” said he, “gout or no gout, and whether Abernethy likes it or not, we must be down at Crawley to-night. The battle will take place upon Crawley Downs. Sir Lothian Hume and his man are at Reigate. I have reserved beds at the George for both of us. The crush will, it is said, exceed anything ever known. The smell of these country inns is always most offensive to me—mais, que voulez vous? Berkeley Cravan was saying in the club last night that there is not a bed within twenty miles of Crawley which is not bespoke, and that they are charging three guineas for the night. I hope that your young friend, if I must describe him as such, will fulfil the promise which he has shown, for I have rather more upon the event than I care to lose. Sir Lothian has been plunging, also—he made a single bye-bet of five thousand to three upon Wilson in Limmer’s yesterday. From what I hear of his affairs it will be a serious matter for him if we should pull it off.—Well, Lorimer!”

“A person to see you, Sir Charles,” said the new valet.

“You know that I never see any one until my dressing is complete.”

“He insists upon seeing you, sir. He pushed open the door.”

"Pushed it open! What do you mean, Lorimer? Why didn't you throw him out?"

A smile passed over the servant's face. At the same moment there came a deep voice from the passage.

"You show me in this instant, young man! D'ye hear? Let me see your master, or it'll be the worse for you!"

I thought that I had heard the voice before, but when over the shoulder of the valet I caught a glimpse of a large, fleshy bull face, with a flattened Michael Angelo nose in the centre of it, I knew at once that it was my neighbour at the supper party.

"It's Warr, the prize-fighter, sir," said I.

"Yes, sir," said our visitor, pushing his huge form into the room. "It's Bill Warr, landlord of the One Ton public house, Jermyn Street, and the gamest man upon the list. There's only one thing that ever beat me, Sir Charles, and that was my flesh, which creeps over me that amazin' fast that I've always four stone that has no business there. Why, sir, I've got enough to spare to make a featherweight champion out of. You'd hardly think to look at me that even after Mendoza fought me I was able to jump the four-foot ropes at the ringside just as light as a little kiddy, but if I was to chuck my castor into the ring now I'd never get it till the wind blew it out again, for blow my dickey if I could climb after!—My respects to you, young sir, and I hope I see you well!”

My uncle's face had expressed considerable disgust at this invasion of his privacy, but it was part of his position to be on good terms with the fighting men, so he contented himself with asking curtly what business had brought him there. For answer the huge prize-fighter looked meaningly at the valet.

“It's important, Sir Charles, and between man and man,” said he.

“You may go, Lorimer.—Now, Warr, what is the matter?”

The bruiser very calmly seated himself astride of a chair, with his arms resting upon the back of it.

“I've got information, Sir Charles,” said he.

“Well, what is it?” cried my uncle, impatiently.

“Information of value.”

“Out with it, then!”

“Information that's worth money,” said Warr, and pursed up his lips.

“I see—you want to be paid for what you know?”

The prize-fighter smiled an affirmative.

"Well, I don't buy things on trust. You should know me better than to try on such a game with me."

"I know you for what you are, Sir Charles, and that is a noble, slap-up Corinthian. But if I was to use this against you, d'ye see, it would be worth hundreds in my pocket. But my 'eart won't let me do it, for Bill Warr's always been on the side o' good sport and fair play. If I use it for you I expects that you won't see me the loser."

"You can do what you like," said my uncle. "If your news is of service to me, I shall know how to treat you."

"You can't say fairer than that. We'll let it stand there, gov'nor, and you'll do the 'andsome thing as you 'ave always 'ad the name of doin'. Well, then, your man, Jim 'Arrison, fights Crab Wilson, of Gloucester, on Crawley Down to-morrow mornin' for a stake."

"What of that?"

"Did you 'appen to know what the bettin' was yesterday?"

"It was three to two on Wilson."

"Right you are, gov'nor. It's seven to one against your man to-day."

"What?"

"Seven to one, gov'nor; no less."

“ You’re talking nonsense, Warr! How could the betting change from three to two to seven to one?”

“ I’ve been to Tom Owen’s, and I’ve been to the ‘Ole in the Wall, and I’ve been to the Wagon and ‘Orses, and you can get seven to one in any of them. There’s tons of money being laid against your man. It’s a ‘orse to a ‘en in every sportin’ ouse and boozin’ ken from ‘ere to Stepney.”

For a moment the expression upon my uncle’s face made me realize that this match was really a serious matter to him. Then he shrugged his shoulders with an incredulous smile.

“ All the worse for the fools who give the odds,” said he. “ My man is all right. You saw him yesterday, nephew?”

“ He was all right yesterday, sir.”

“ If anything had gone wrong I should have heard.”

“ But perhaps,” said Warr meaningly, “ it ’as not gone wrong with ‘im yet.”

“ What d’you mean?”

“ I’ll tell you what I mean, sir. You remember Berks? You know that he ain’t to be much depended upon at any time, and that he had a grudge against your man ‘cause he laid ‘im out in the coach house. Well, last night, about ten o’clock, in he comes into my bar, and the three bloodiest rogues in London at 'is 'eels. There was Red Ike, 'im that was warned off the ring 'cause 'e fought a cross with Bittoon. And there was Fightin' Yussef, who would sell his mother for a seven-shillin' bit. The third was Chris McCarthy, who is a fogle-snatcher by trade with a pitch outside the Haymarket Theatre. You don't often see four such beauties together, and all with as much as they could carry, save only Chris, who is too leary a cove to drink when there's somethin' goin' forward. For my part I showed them into the parlour, not 'cos they was worthy of it, but 'cos I knew right well they would start bashin' some of my customers and maybe get my license into trouble if I left 'em in the bar. I served 'em with drink and staid with 'em just to see that they didn't lay their 'ands on the stuffed paroquet and the pictures.

“ Well, gov'nor, to cut it short, they began to talk about the fight, and they all laughed at the idea that young Jim 'Arrison could win it—all except Chris, and 'e kept a-nudgin' and a-twitchin' at the others until Joe Berks nearly gave him a wipe across the face for his trouble. I saw somethin' was in the wind, and it wasn't very 'ard to guess what it was, especially when Red Ike was ready to put up a fiver that Jim 'Arrison would never fight at all. So I up to get another bottle of liptrap and I slipped round to the shutter that we pass the liquor through from the private bar into the parlour. I drew it an inch open, and I might 'ave been at the table with them I could 'ear every word that clearly.

“ There was Chris McCarthy growlin' at them for not keepin' their tongues still, and there was Joe Berks swearin' that 'e would knock 'is face in if 'e dared give 'im any of 'is lip. So Chris 'e sort of argued with 'em, for 'e was frightened of Berks, and 'e put it to them whether they would be fit for the job in the mornin', and whether the gov'nor would pay the money if 'e found they 'ad been drinkin', and were not to be trusted. This struck them sober, all three, and Fightin' Yussef asked what time they were to start. Chris said that as long as they were at Crawley before the George shut up they could work it. 'It's poor pay for a chance of a rope!' said Red Ike. 'Rope be damned!' cried Chris, taking a little loaded stick out of 'is side pocket. 'If three of you 'old 'im down and I break 'is arm-bone with this, we've earned our money, and we don't risk more'n six months' skilly and crank.' 'He'll fight,' said Berks. 'Well, it's the only fight 'e'll get,' said Chris. And that was all I 'eard of it. This mornin' out I went, and I found, as I told you, that the money is goin' on to Wilson by the ton, and that no odds are too long for the layers. So it stands, gov'nor, and you know what the meanin' of it may be better than Bill Warr can tell you."

"Very good, Warr," said my uncle, rising. "I am very much obliged to you for telling me this, and I will see that you are not a loser by it. I put it down as the gossip of drunken ruffians, but none the less you have served me vastly by calling my attention to it. I suppose I shall see you at the Downs to-morrow?"

"Mr. Jackson 'as asked me to be one o' the beaters-out, sir."

"Very good. I hope that we shall have a fair and good fight. Good day to you, and thank you."

My uncle had preserved his jaunty demeanour as long as Warr was in the room, but the door had hardly closed upon him before he turned to me with a face which was more agitated than I had ever seen it.

"We must be off for Crawley at once, nephew," said he, ringing the bell. "There's not a moment to be lost.—Lorimer, order the bays to be harnessed in the curricle. Put the toilet things in, and tell William to have it round at the door as soon as possible."

"I'll see to it, sir," said I, and away I ran to the mews in Little Ryder Street, where my uncle stabled his horses. The groom was away, and I had to send a lad in search of him, while with the help of the liveryman I dragged the curricule from the coach house and brought the two mares out of their stalls. It was half an hour, or possibly three quarters, before everything had been found, and Lorimer was already waiting in Jermyn Street with the inevitable baskets, while my uncle stood in the open door of his house clad in his long fawn-coloured driving coat, with no sign upon his calm face of the tumult of impatience which must, I was sure, be raging within.

“We shall leave you, Lorimer,” said he. “We might find it hard to get a bed for you. Keep at her head, William!—Jump in, nephew.—Hullo, Warr! what is the matter now?”

The prize-fighter was hastening toward us as fast as his bulk would allow.

“Just one word before you go, Sir Charles,” he panted. “I’ve just ’eard in my tap room that the four men I spoke of left for Crawley at one o’clock.”

“Very good, Warr,” said my uncle, with his foot upon the step.

“And the odds have risen to ten to one.”

“Let go her head, William!”

“Just one more word, gov’nor. You’ll excuse the liberty, but if I was you I'd take my pistols with me."

"Thank you. I have them." The long thong cracked between the ears of the leader, the groom sprang for the pavement, and Jermyn Street had changed for St. James, and that again for Whitehall with a swiftness which showed that the galant mares were as impatient as their master. It was 4.30 by the Parliament clock as we flew onto Westminster bridge. There was the flash of water beneath us, and then we were between those two long dun-coloured lines of houses which had been the avenue which had led up to London. My uncle sat with tightened lips and a brooding brow. We had reached Streatham before he broke the silence.

"I have a good deal at stake, nephew," said he.

"So have I, sir," I answered.

"You!" he cried, in surprise.

"My friend, sir."

"Ah, yes, I had forgot. You have some eccentricities, after all, nephew. You are a faithful friend, which is a rare enough thing in our circles. I never had but one friend of my own position, and he—but you've heard me tell the story. I fear it will be dark before we reach Crawley."

“I fear that it will.”

“In that case we may be too late.”

“Pray God not, sir!”

“We sit behind the best cattle in England, but I fear lest we find the roads blocked before we get to Crawley. Did you observe, nephew, that these four villains spoke in Warr’s hearing of the master who was behind them, and who was paying them for their infamy? Did you not understand that they were hired to cripple my man? Who, then, could have hired them? Who had an interest unless it was— I know Sir Lothian Hume to be a desperate man. I know that he has had heavy card losses at Watier’s and White’s. I know also that he has much at stake upon this event, and that he has plunged upon it with a rashness which made his friends think that he had some private reason for being satisfied as to the result. By Heaven! It all hangs together! If it should be so!” He relapsed into silence, but I saw the same look of cold fierceness settle upon his features which I had marked there when he and Sir John Lade had raced wheel to wheel down the Godstone road.

The sun sank slowly toward the low Surrey hills, and the shadows crept steadily eastward, but the whirr of the wheels and the roar of the hoofs never slackened. A fresh wind blew upon our faces, while the young leaves drooped motionless from the wayside branches. The golden edge of the sun was just sinking behind the oaks of Reigate Hill when the dripping mares drew up before the Crown at Redhill. The landlord, an old sportsman and ring-sider, ran out to greet so well-known a Corinthian as Sir Charles Tregellis.

"You know Berks, the bruiser?" asked my uncle.

"Yes, Sir Charles."

"Has he passed?"

"Yes, Sir Charles. It may have been about four o'clock, though with this crowd of folk and carriages it's hard to swear to it. There was him and Red Ike and Fighting Yusef, the Jew, and another, with a good bit of blood betwixt the shafts. They'd been driving her hard, too, for she was all in a lather."

"That's ugly, nephew," said my uncle, when we were flying onward toward Reigate. "If they drove so hard it looks as though they wished to get early to work."

"Jim and Belcher would surely be a match for the four of them," I suggested.

"If Belcher were with him I should have no fear. But you can not tell what diablerie they may be up to. Let us only find him safe and sound, and I'll never lose sight of him till I see him in the ring. We'll sit up on guard, with our pistols, nephew, and I only trust that these villains may be indiscreet enough to attempt it. But they must have been very sure of success before they put the odds up to such a figure, and it is that which alarms me."

"But surely they have nothing to win by such villainy, sir? If they were to hurt Jim Harrison the battle could not be fought and the bets would not be decided."

"So it would be in an ordinary prize battle, nephew, and it is fortunate that it should be so, or the rascals who infest the ring would soon make all sport impossible. But here it is different. On the terms of the wager I lose unless I can produce a man within the prescribed ages who can beat Crab Wilson. You must remember that I have never named my man. C'est dommage, but so it is! We know who it is, and so do our opponents, but the referees and stakeholders would take no notice of that. If we complain that Jim Harrison has been crippled, they would answer that they have no official knowledge that Jim Harrison was our nominee. It's play or pay, and the villains are taking advantage of it."

My uncle's fears as to our being blocked upon the road were only too well founded, for after we passed Reigate there was such a procession of every sort of vehicle that I believe for the whole eight miles there was not a horse whose nose was farther than a few feet from the back of the curricle or barouche in front. Every road leading from London, as well as those from Guildford in the west and Tunbridge in the east, had contributed their stream of four-in-hands, gigs, and mounted sportsmen, until the whole broad Brighton highway was choked from ditch to ditch with a laughing, singing, shouting throng, all flowing in the same direction. No man who looked upon that motley crowd could deny that for good or evil the love of the ring was confined to no class, but was a national peculiarity, deeply seated in the English nature, and a common heritage of the young aristocrat in his drag and of the rough costers sitting six deep in their pony-cart.

There I saw statesmen and soldiers, noblemen and lawyers, farmers and squires, with roughs of the East End and yokels of the shires, all toiling along with the prospect of a night of discomfort before them, on the chance of seeing a fight, which might, for all that they knew, be decided in a single round. A more cheery and hearty set of people could not be imagined, and the chaff flew about as thick as the dust clouds, while at every wayside inn the landlord and the drawers would be out with trays of foam-headed tankards to moisten those importunate throats. The ale-drinking, the rude good-fellowship, the heartiness, the laughter at discomforts, the craving to see the fight, all these may be set down as vulgar and trivial by those to whom they are distasteful, but to me, listening to the far-off and uncertain echoes of our distant past, they seem to have been the very bones upon which much that is most solid and virile in this ancient race was moulded.

But, alas for our chance of hastening onward! Even my uncle's skill could not pick a passage through that moving mass. We could but fall into our places and be content to snail along from Reigate to Horley and on to Povey Cross, and over Lowfield Heath, while day shaded away into twilight and that deepened into night. At Kimberham bridge the carriage lamps were all lit, and it was wonderful where the road curved downward before us to see this writhing serpent with the golden scales crawling before us in the darkness. And then at last we saw the formless mass of the huge Crawley Elm looming before us in the gloom, and there was the broad village street with the glimmer of the cottage windows, and the high front of the old George Inn glowing from every door and pane and crevice in honour of the noble company who were to sleep within that night.

CHAPTER XV.

FOUL PLAY.

MY uncle's impatience would not suffer him to wait for the slow rotation which would bring us to the door, but he flung the reins and a crown piece to one of the rough fellows who thronged the sidewalk, and pushing his way vigorously through the crowd he made for the entrance. As he came within the circle of light thrown by the windows a whisper ran around as to who this masterful gentleman with the pale face and the driving coat might be, and a lane was formed to admit us. I had never before understood the popularity of my uncle in the sporting world, for the folk began to huzza as we passed, with cries of "Hurrah for Buck Tregellis!—Good luck to you and your man, Sir Charles!—Clear a path for a bang-up noble Corinthian!" while the landlord, attracted by the shouting, came running out to greet us.

"Good evening, Sir Charles!" he cried. "I hope I see you well, sir, and I trust that you will find that your man does credit to the George."

A lane was formed to admit us.

"How is he?" asked my uncle, quickly.

"Never better, sir. Looks a picture, he does—and fit to fight for a kingdom."

My uncle gave a sigh of relief.

"Where is he?" he asked.

"He's gone to his room, early, sir, seein' that he had some very partic'lar business to-morrow mornin'," said the landlord, grinning.

"Where is Belcher?"

"Here he is, sir, in the bar parlour."

He opened a door as he spoke, and looking in we saw a score of well-dressed men, some of whose faces had become familiar to me during my short West End career, seated round a table, upon which stood a steaming soup tureen filled with punch. At the farther end, very much at his ease among the aristocrats and exquisites who surrounded him, sat the champion of England, his superb figure thrown back in his chair, a flush upon his handsome face, and a loose red handkerchief knotted carelessly round his throat in the picturesque fashion which was long known by his name. Half a century has passed since then, and I have seen my share of fine men. Perhaps it is because I am a slight creature myself, but it is my peculiarity; I had rather look upon a splendid man than upon any work of Nature. Yet during all that time I have never seen a finer man than Jem Belcher, and if I wish to match him in my memory I can only turn to that other Jim whose fate and fortunes I am trying to lay before you.

There was a shout of jovial greeting when my uncle's face was seen in the doorway.

"Come in, Tregellis! We were expecting you!—There's a devilled bladebone ordered.—What's the latest from London?—What is the meaning of the long odds against your man?—Have the folk gone mad?—What the devil is it all about?" They were all talking at once.

"Excuse me, gentlemen," my uncle answered. "I shall be happy to give you any information in my power a little later. I have a matter of some slight importance to decide.—Belcher, I would have a word with you!"

The champion came with us into the passage.

"Where is your man, Belcher?"

"He has gone to his room, sir. I believe that he should have a clear twelve hours' sleep before fighting."

"What sort of day has he had?"

"I did him lightly in the matter of exercise. Clubs, dumbbells, walking, and a half hour with the muffers. He'll do us all proud, sir, or I'm a Dutchman! But what in the world's amiss with the betting? If I didn't know that he was as straight as a line, I'd 'a' thought he was planning a cross and laying against himself."

"It's about that I've hurried down. I have good information, Belcher, that there has been a plot to cripple him, and that the rogues are so sure of success that they are prepared to lay anything against his appearance."

Belcher whistled between his teeth.

"I've seen no sign of anything of the kind, sir. No one has been near him, or had speech with him, except only your nephew there and myself."

"Four villains with Berks at their head got the start of us by several hours. It was Warr who told me."

"What Bill Warr says is straight, and what Joe Berks does is crooked. Who were the others, sir?"

"Red Ike, Fighting Yussef, and Chris McCarthy."

"A pretty gang, too! Well, sir, the lad is safe, but it would be as well perhaps for one or other of us to stay in his room with him. For my own part, as long as he's my charge I'm never very far away."

"It is a pity to wake him."

"He can hardly be asleep with all this racket in the house. This way, sir, and down the passage!"

We passed along the low-roofed devious corridors of the old-fashioned inn to the back of the house.

"This is my room, sir," said Belcher, nodding to a door upon the right. "This one upon the left is his." He threw it open as he spoke. "Here's Sir Charles Tregellis come to see you, Jim," said he—and then, "Good Lord! what is the meaning of this?"

The little chamber lay before us, brightly illuminated by a brass lamp, which stood upon the table. The bedclothes had not been turned down, but there was an indentation upon the counterpane which showed that some one had lain there. One half of the lattice window was swinging on its hinge, and a cloth cap, lying upon the table, was the only sign of the occupant. My uncle looked round him and shook his head.

"It seems that we are too late," said he.

"That's his cap, sir. Where in the world can he have gone to with his head bare? I thought he was safe in his bed an hour ago.—Jim! Jim!" he shouted.

"He has certainly gone through the window," cried my uncle. "I believe these villains have enticed him out by some devilish device of their own.—Hold the lamp, nephew!—Ha, I thought so! Here are his footmarks upon the flower bed outside!”

The landlord and one or two of the Corinthians from the bar parlour had followed us to the back of the house. Some one had opened the side door, and we found ourselves in the kitchen garden, where, clustering upon the gravel path, we were able to hold the lamp over the soft newly turned earth which lay between us and the window.

“That’s his footmark!” cried Belcher. “He wore his running boots this evening, and you can see the nails. But what’s this? Some one else has been here.”

“A woman!” I cried.

“By Heaven, you are right, Rodney!” said my uncle.

Belcher gave a hearty curse.

“He never had a word to say to any girl in the village. I took partic’lar notice of that. And to think of them coming in like this at the last moment!”

“It’s clear as possible, Tregellis,” said the Honourable Berkeley Craven, who was one of the company from the bar parlour. “Whoever it was came outside the window and tapped. You see here and here the small feet have their toes to the house, while the others are all leading away. She came to summon him, and he followed her."

"That is perfectly certain," said my uncle. "There's not a moment to be lost. We must divide and search in different directions, unless we can get some clew as to where they have gone."

"There's only this one path out of the garden," cried the landlord, leading the way. "It opens out into this back lane, which leads up to the stables. The other end of the lane goes out into the side road."

The bright yellow glare from a stable lantern cut a ring suddenly from the darkness, and an ostler came lounging out of the yard.

"Who's that?" cried the landlord.

"It's me, master, Bill Shields."

"How long have you been there, Bill?"

"Well, master, I've been in an 'out of the stable this hour back. We can't pack in another 'orse, and there's no use tryin'. I daren't 'ardly give them their feed, for if they was to thicken out just ever so little——"

"See here, Bill! Be careful how you answer, for a mistake may cost you your place. Have you seen any one pass down the lane?"

"There was a fellow in a rabbit-skin cap some time ago. 'E was loiterin' about, until I asked 'im what 'is business was, for I didn't care about the looks of 'im, or the way that 'e was peepin' in at the windows. I turned the stable lantern onto 'im, but 'e ducked 'is face, an' I could only swear to 'is red 'ead."

I cast a quick glance at my uncle, and I saw that the shadow had deepened upon his face.

"What became of him?" he asked.

"'E slouched away, sir, an' I saw the last of 'im."

"You've seen no one else? You didn't, for example, see a woman and a man pass down the lane together?"

"No, sir."

"Or hear anything unusual?"

"Why, now that you mention it, sir, I did 'ear somethin', but on a night like this, when all these London blades are in the village——"

"What was it, then?" cried my uncle, impatiently.

"Well, sir, it was a kind of a cry out yonder, as if some one 'ad got 'imself into trouble. I thought maybe two sparks were fightin', and I took no partic'lar notice."

"Where did it come from?"

"From the side road yonder."

"Was it distant?"

“No, sir; I should say it didn't come from more'n two hundred yards.”

“A single cry?”

“Well, it was a kind of a screech, sir; and then I 'eard somebody drivin' very 'ard down the road. I remember thinkin' that it was strange that any one should be drivin' away from Crawley on a great night like this.”

My uncle seized the lantern from the fellow's hand, and we all trooped behind him down the lane. At the farther end the road cut it across at right angles. Down this my uncle hastened, but his search was not a long one, for the glaring light fell suddenly upon something which brought a groan to my lips and a bitter curse to those of Belcher. Along the white surface of the dusty highway there was drawn a long smear of crimson, while beside this ominous stain there lay a murderous little pocket bludgeon, such as Warr had described in the morning.

CHAPTER XVI.

CRAWLEY DOWNS.

ALL through that weary night my uncle and I, with Belcher, Berkeley Craven, and a dozen of the Corinthians, searched the countryside for some trace of our missing man, but save for that ill-boding splash upon the road, not the slightest clew could be obtained as to what had befallen him. No one had seen or heard anything of him, and the single cry in the night of which the ostler told us was the only indication of the tragedy which had taken place. In small parties we scoured the country as far as East Grinstead and Bletchingly, and the sun had been long over the horizon before we found ourselves back at Crawley once more, with heavy hearts and tired feet. My uncle, who had driven to Reigate in the hope of gaining some intelligence, did not return until past seven o'clock, and a glance at his face gave us the same black news which he gathered from ours.

We held a council round our dismal breakfast table, to which Mr. Berkeley Craven was invited as a man of sound wisdom and large experience in matters of sport. Belcher was half frenzied by this sudden ending of all the pains which he had taken in the training, and could only rave out threats at Berks and his companions, with terrible menaces as to what he would do when he met them. My uncle sat grave and thoughtful, eating nothing and drumming his fingers upon the table, while my heart was heavy within me, and I could have sunk my face into my hands and burst into tears as I thought how powerless I was to aid my friend. Mr. Craven, a fresh-faced, alert man of the world, was the only one of us who seemed to preserve both his wits and his appetite.

“Let me see! The fight was to be at ten, was it not?” he asked.

“It was to be.”

“I dare say it will be, too. Never say die, Tregellis! Your man has still three hours in which to come back.”

My uncle shook his head.

“The villains have done their work too well for that, I fear,” said he.

“Well, now, let us reason it out,” said Berkeley Craven. “A woman comes and she coaxes this young man out of his room. Do you know any young woman who had an influence over him?"

My uncle looked at me.

"No," said I, "I know of none."

"Well, we know that she came," said Berkeley Craven. "There can be no question as to that. She brought some piteous tale, no doubt, such as a gallant young man could hardly refuse to listen to. He fell into the trap and allowed himself to be decoyed to the place where these rascals were waiting for him. We may take all that as proved, I should fancy, Tregellis."

"I see no better explanation," said my uncle.

"Well, then, it is obviously not the interest of these men to kill him. Warr heard them say as much. They could not make sure, perhaps, of doing so tough a young fellow an injury which would certainly prevent him from fighting. Even with a broken arm he might pull the fight off, as men have done before. There was too much money on for them to run any risks. They gave him a tap on the head, therefore, to prevent his making too much resistance, and they then drove him off to some farmhouse or stable, where they will hold him a prisoner until the time for the fight is over. I warrant that you see him before night as well as ever he was."

This theory sounded so reasonable that it seemed to lift a little of the load off my heart, but I could see that from my uncle's point of view it was a poor consolation.

"I dare say you are right, Craven," said he.

"I am sure that I am."

"But it won't help us to win the fight."

"That's the point, sir," cried Belcher. "By the Lord, I wish they'd let me take his place, even with my left arm strapped behind me!"

"I should advise you, in any case, to go to the ringside," said Craven. "You should hold on until the last moment, in the hope of your man turning up."

"I shall certainly do so. And I shall protest against paying the wagers under such circumstances."

Craven shrugged his shoulders.

"You remember the conditions of the match," said he. "I fear it is play or pay. No doubt the point might be submitted to the referees, but I can not doubt that they would have to give it against you."

We had sunk into a melancholy silence, when suddenly Belcher sprang up from the table.

"By George!" he cried, "hark to that!"

"What is it?" we cried all three.

"The betting! Hark again!"

Out of the babel of voices and roaring of wheels outside the window a single sentence struck sharply upon our ears.

“Even money upon Sir Charles’s nominee!”

“Even money!” cried my uncle. “It was seven to one against me yesterday. What is the meaning of this?”

“Even money either way!” cried the voice again.

“There’s somebody knows something,” said Belcher, “and there’s nobody has a better right to know what it is than we—Come on, sir, and we’ll get to the bottom of it.”

The village street was packed with people, for they had been sleeping twelve and fifteen in a room, while hundreds of gentlemen had spent the night in their carriages. So thick was the throng that it was no easy matter to get out of the door of the George. A drunken man, snoring horribly in his breathing, was curled up in the passage, absolutely oblivious to the stream of people who flowed round and occasionally over him.

“What’s the betting, boys?” asked Belcher from the steps.

“Even money, Jem,” cried several voices.

“It was long odds on Wilson when last I heard.”

“Yes, but there came a man who laid freely the other way, and he started others taking the odds until now you can get even money."

"Who started it?"

"Why, that's he! The man that lies drunk in the passage. He's been pouring it down like water ever since he drove in at six o'clock, so it's no wonder he's gone under."

Belcher stooped down and turned over the man's inert head.

"He's a stranger to me, sir."

"And to me," added my uncle.

"But not to me," I cried. "It's John Cumming, the landlord of the inn at Friar's Oak. I've known him ever since I was a boy, and I can't be mistaken."

"Well, what the devil can he know about it?" said Craven.

"Nothing at all, in all probability," answered my uncle. "He is backing young Jim because he knows him, and because he has more brandy than sense. His drunken confidence set others to do the same, and so the odds came down."

"He was as sober as a judge when he drove in here this morning," said the landlord. "He began backing Sir Charles's nominee from the moment he arrived. Some of the other boys took the office from him, and they very soon brought the odds down, among them."

"I wish he had not brought himself down as well," said my uncle. "I beg that you bring me a little lavender water, landlord, for the smell of this crowd is appalling—I suppose you couldn't get any sense out of this drunken fellow, nephew, or find out what it is he knows."

It was in vain that I rocked him by the shoulder and shouted his name in his ear. Nothing could break in upon that serene intoxication.

"Well, it's a unique situation, as far as my experience goes," said Berkeley Craven. "Here we are, within a couple of hours of the fight, and yet you don't know whether you have a man to represent you. I hope you don't stand to lose very much, Tregellis."

My uncle shrugged his shoulders carelessly and took a pinch of his snuff with that inimitable sweeping gesture which no man has ever ventured to imitate.

"Pretty well, my boy!" said he. "But it is time that we thought of going up to the Downs. This night journey has left me just a little effleuré, and I should like half an hour of privacy to arrange my toilet. If this is my last kick, it shall at least be with a well-brushed boot."

I have heard a traveller from the wilds of America say that he looked upon the red Indian and the English gentleman as closely akin, citing the passion for sport, the aloofness, and the suppression of the emotions in each. I thought of his words as I watched my uncle that morning, for I believe that no victim tied to the stake could have had a worse outlook before him. It was not merely that his own fortunes were largely at stake, but it was the dreadful position in which he would stand before this immense concourse of people, many of whom had put their money upon his judgment, if he should find himself at the last moment with an impotent excuse instead of a champion to put before them. What a situation for a man who prided himself upon his aplomb and upon bringing all that he undertook to the very highest standard of success! I, who knew him well, could tell from his wan cheeks and restless fingers that he was at his wit's end what to do, but no stranger who observed his jaunty bearing, the flicking of his laced handkerchief, the handling of his quizzing glass, or the shooting of his ruffles, would ever have thought that this butterfly creature could have had a care upon earth.

It was close upon nine o'clock when we were ready to start for the Downs, and by that time my uncle's curricle was almost the only vehicle left in the village street. The night before they had lain with their wheels interlocking and their shafts under each other's bodies, as thick as they could fit, from the old church to the Crawley Elm, spanning the road five deep for a good half mile in length. Now the gray village street lay before us, almost deserted, save by a few women and children. Men, horses, carriages, all were gone. My uncle drew on his driving gloves and arranged his costume with punctilious neatness, but I observed that he glanced up and down the road with a haggard and yet expectant eye before he took his seat. I sat behind with Belcher, while the Honourable Berkeley Craven took the place beside him.

The road from Crawley curves gently upward to the upland heather-clad plateau which extends for many miles in every direction. Strings of pedestrians, most of them so weary and dust-covered that it was evident that they had walked the thirty miles from London during the night, were plodding along by the sides of the road or trailing over the long mottled slopes of the moorland. A horseman, fantastically dressed in green and splendidly mounted, was waiting at the cross-roads, and as he spurred toward us I recognised the dark, handsome face and bold black eyes of Mendoza.

"I am waiting here to give the office, Sir Charles," said he. "It's down the Grinstead road, half a mile to the left."

"Very good," said my uncle, reining his mares round into the crossroad.

"You haven't got your man there," remarked Mendoza, with something of suspicion in his manner.

"What the devil is that to you?" cried Belcher furiously.

"It's a good deal to all of us, for there are some funny rumours about!"

"You keep them to yourself, then, or you may wish you had never heard them!"

"All right, Jem! Your breakfast don't seem to have agreed with you this morning."

"Have the others arrived?" asked my uncle carelessly.

"Not yet, Sir Charles. But Tom Oliver is there with the ropes and stakes. Jackson drove by just now, and most of the ring-keepers are up."

"We have still an hour," remarked my uncle, as he drove on. "It is possible that the others may be late, since they have to come from Reigate."

"You take it like a man, Tregellis," said Craven.

“ We must keep a bold face and brazen it out until the last moment.”

“ Of course, sir,” cried Belcher, “ I’ll never believe the betting would rise like that if somebody didn’t know something. We’ll hold on by our teeth and nails, sir, and see what comes of it.”

We could hear a sound like the waves upon the beach long before we came in sight of that mighty multitude, and then at last on a sudden dip of the road we saw it lying before us, a whirlpool of humanity with an open vortex in the centre. All round the thousands of carriages and horses were dotted over the moor, and the slopes were gay with tents and booths. A spot had been chosen for the ring where a great basin had been hollowed out in the grounds, so that all round that natural amphitheatre a crowd of thirty thousand people could see very well what was going on in the centre. As we drove up a buzz of greeting came from the people upon the fringe, which was nearest to us, spreading and spreading, until the whole multitude had joined in the acclamation. Then an instant later a second shout broke forth, beginning from the other side of the arena, and the faces which had been turned toward us whisked around so that in a twinkling the whole foreground changed from white to dark.

"It's they. They are in time," said my uncle and Craven together.

Standing up on our curricule we could see the cavalcade approaching over the Downs. In front came a huge yellow barouche, in which sat Sir Lothian Hume, Crab Wilson, and Captain Barclay, his trainer. The postillions were flying canary-yellow ribbons from their caps, those being the colours under which Wilson was to fight. Behind the carriage there rode a hundred or more noblemen and gentlemen of the west country, and then a line of gigs, tilburies, and carriages wound away down the Grinstead road as far as our eyes could follow it. The big barouche came lumbering over the sward in our direction, until Sir Lothian Hume caught sight of us, when he shouted to his postillions to pull up.

"Good morning, Sir Charles," said he, springing out of the carriage. "I thought I knew your scarlet curricule. We have an excellent morning for the battle."

My uncle bowed coldly and made no answer.

"I suppose that since we are all here we may begin at once," said Sir Lothian, taking no notice of the other's manner.

"We begin at ten o'clock; not an instant before."

“Very good ; if you prefer it. By the way, Sir Charles, where is your man ?”

“I would ask you that question, Sir Lothian,” answered my uncle. “Where is my man ?”

A look of astonishment passed over Sir Lothian’s features, which, if it were not real was most admirably affected.

“What do you mean by asking me such a question ?”

“Because I wish to know.”

“But how can I tell, and what business is it of mine ?”

“I have reason to believe that you have made it your business.”

“If you would kindly put the matter a little more clearly there would be some possibility of my understanding you.”

They were both very white and cold, formal and unimpassioned in their bearing, but exchanging glances which crossed like rapier blades. I thought of Sir Lothian’s murderous repute as a duellist, and I trembled for my uncle.

“Now, sir, if you imagine that you have a grievance against me, you will oblige me vastly by putting it into words.”

“I will,” said my uncle. “There has been a conspiracy to maim or kidnap my man, and I have every reason to believe that you are privy to it."

An ugly sneer came over Sir Lothian's saturnine face.

"I see," said he, "your man has not come on quite as well as you had expected in his training, and you are hard put to it to invent an excuse. Still I should have thought you might have found a more probable one, and one which would entail less serious consequences."

"Sir," answered my uncle, in a sudden hot blast of rage, "you are a liar, but how great a liar nobody knows save yourself!"

Sir Lothian's hollow cheeks grew white with passion, and I saw for an instant in his deep-set eyes such a glare as comes from the frenzied hound, rearing and ramping at the end of its chain. Then with an effort he became the same cold, hard, self-contained man as ever.

"It does not become our position to quarrel like two yokels at a fair," said he; "we shall go further into the matter afterward."

"I promise you that we shall," answered my uncle, grimly.

"Meanwhile, I hold you to the terms of your wager. Unless you produce your nominee within five and twenty minutes I claim the match."

"Eight and twenty minutes," said my uncle, looking at his watch. "You may claim it then, but not an instant before."

He was admirable at that moment, for his manner was that of a man with all sorts of hidden resources, so that I could hardly make myself realize as I looked at him that our position was really as desperate as I knew it to be. In the meantime Berkeley Craven, who had been exchanging a few words with Sir Lothian Hume, came back to our side.

"I have been asked to be sole referee in this matter," said he. "Does that meet with your wishes, Sir Charles?"

"I should be vastly obliged to you, Craven, if you will undertake the duties."

"And Jackson has been suggested as time-keeper."

"I could not wish a better one."

"Very good. That is settled."

In the meantime the last of the carriages had come up, and the horses had all been picketed upon the moor. The stragglers who had dotted the grass had closed in until the huge crowd was one unit with a single mighty voice, which was already beginning to bellow its impatience.

Looking around, there was hardly a moving object upon the whole vast expanse of green and purple down. A belated gig was coming at full gallop down the road which led from the south, and a few pedestrians were still trailing up from Crawley, but nowhere was there a sign of the missing man.

"The betting keeps up for all that," said Belcher. "I've just been to the ringside and it is still even."

"There's a place for you at the outer ropes, Sir Charles," said Craven.

"There is no sign of my man yet. I won't come in until he arrives."

"It is my duty to tell you that only ten minutes are left."

"I make it five," cried Sir Lothian Hume.

"That is a question which lies with the referee," said Craven, firmly. "My watch makes it ten minutes and ten it must be."

"Here's Crab Wilson!" cried Belcher, and at the same moment a shout like a thunderclap burst from the crowd. The west countryman had emerged from his dressing tent, followed by Dutch Sam and Tom Owen, who were acting as his seconds. He was nude to the waist, with a pair of white calico drawers, white silk stockings, and running shoes. Round his middle was a canary-yellow sash and dainty little ribbons of the same colour fluttered from the sides of his knees. He carried a high white hat in his hand, and, running down the lane, which had been kept open through the crowd, to allow persons to reach the ring, he threw the hat high into the air, so that it fell within the staked inclosure. Then with a double spring he cleared the outer and inner line of rope, and stood with his arms folded in the centre.

I do not wonder that the people cheered. Even Belcher could not help joining in the general shout of applause. He was certainly a splendidly built young athlete, and one could not have wished to look upon a finer sight as his white skin, sleek and luminous as a panther's, gleamed in the light of the morning sun, with a beautiful liquid, rippling of muscles at every movement. His arms were long and slinky, his shoulders loose and yet powerful, with the downward slant which is a surer index of power than squareness can be. He clasped his hands behind his head, threw them aloft, and swung them backward, and at every movement some fresh expanse of his white skin became knotted and gnarled with muscle, while a yell of admiration and delight from the crowd greeted each fresh exhibition. Then, folding his arms once more, he stood like a beautiful statue waiting for his antagonist.

Sir Lothian Hume had been looking impatiently at his watch, and now he shut it with a triumphant snap.

"Time's up!" he cried. "The match is forfeit."

"Time is not up," said Craven.

"I have still five minutes." My uncle looked round with despairing eyes.

"Only three, Tregellis."

A deep, angry murmur was rising from the crowd. "It's a cross! It's a cross! It's a fake!" was the cry.

"Two minutes, Tregellis!"

"Where's your man, Sir Charles? Where's the man that we have backed?" Flushed faces began to crane over each other and angry eyes glared up at us.

"One more minute, Tregellis! I am very sorry, but it will be my duty to declare it forfeit against you."

There was a sudden swirl in the crowd, a rush, a shout, and high up in the air there spun an old black hat, floating over the heads of the ringsiders and flickering down within the ropes.

"Saved, by the Lord!" screamed Belcher.

"I rather fancy," said my uncle calmly, "that this must be my man."

"Too late!" cried Sir Lothian.

"No," answered the referee. "It is still twenty seconds to the hour. The fight will now proceed."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE RINGSIDE.

OUT of the whole of that vast multitude I was one of the very few who had observed whence it was that this black hat, skimming so opportunely over the ropes, had come. I have already remarked that when we looked around us there had been a single gig travelling very rapidly upon the southern road. My uncle's eyes had rested upon it, but his attention had been drawn away by the discussion between Sir Lothian Hume and the referee upon the question of time. For my own part, I had been so struck by the furious manner in which these belated travellers were approaching that I had continued to watch them with all sorts of vague hopes within me, which I did not dare to put into words for fear of adding to my uncle's disappointments. I had just made out that the gig contained a man and a woman, when suddenly I saw it swerve off the road and come with a galloping horse and bounding wheels right across the moor, crashing through the gorse bushes and sinking down to the hubs in the heather and bracken. As the driver pulled up his foam-spattered horse he threw the reins to his companion, sprang from his seat, butted furiously at the crowd, and then an instant afterward up went the hat which told of his challenge and defiance.

“There is no hurry now, I presume, Craven,” said my uncle as coolly as if this sudden effect had been carefully devised by him.

“Now that your man has his hat in the ring, you can take as much time as you like, Sir Charles.”

“Your friend has certainly cut it rather fine, nephew.”

“It is not Jim, sir,” I whispered; “it is some one else.”

My uncle’s eyebrows betrayed his astonishment.

“Some one else!” he ejaculated.

“And a good man, too!” roared Belcher, slapping his thigh with a crack like a pistol-shot. “Why, blow my dickey, if it ain’t old Jack Harrison himself!”

Looking down at the crowd, we had seen the head and shoulders of a powerful and strenuous man moving slowly forward, and leaving behind him a long V-shaped ripple upon its surface like the wake of a swimming dog. Now, as he pushed his way through the looser fringes, the head was raised, and there was the grinning, hardy face of the smith looking up at us. He had left his hat in the ring, and he was enveloped in an overcoat with a blue bird's-eye handkerchief tied around his neck. As he emerged from the throng he let his greatcoat fly loose, and showed that he was dressed in his full fighting kit—black drawers, chocolate stockings, and white shoes.

“I'm right sorry to be so late, Sir Charles,” he cried. “I'd have been sooner, but it took me a little time to make it all right with the missus. I couldn't convince her all at once, an' so I brought her with me, and we argued it out on the way.” Looking at the gig, I saw now that it was indeed Mrs. Harrison who was seated in it.

Sir Charles beckoned him up to the wheel of the curricula.

“What in the world brings you here, Harrison?” he whispered. “I am as glad to see you as ever I was to see a man in my life, but I confess I did not expect you.”

“Well, sir, you heard I was coming,” said the smith.

"Indeed, I did not."

"Didn't you get a message, Sir Charles, from a man named Cumming, landlord of the Friar's Oak Inn? Master Rodney there would know him."

"We saw him dead drunk at the George."

"There, now, if I wasn't afraid of it!" cried Harrison, angrily. "He's always like that when he's excited, and I never saw a man more off his head than he was when he heard I was goin' to take this job over. He brought a bag of sovereigns up with him to back me with."

"That's how the betting got turned," said my uncle. "He found others to follow his lead, it appears."

"I was so afraid that he might get upon the drink that I made him promise to go straight to you, sir, the very instant he should arrive. He had a note to deliver."

"I understand that he reached the George at six, while I did not return from Reigate until after seven, by which time I have no doubt that he had drunk his message to me out of his head. But where is your nephew, Jim, and how did you come to know that you would be needed?"

"It is not his fault, I promise you, that you should be left in the lurch. As to me, I had my orders to take his place from the only man on earth whose word I have never disobeyed."

"Yes, Sir Charles," said Mrs. Harrison, who had left the gig and approached us, "you can make the most of it this time, for never again shall you have my Jack—not if you were to go on your knees for him!"

"She's not a patron of sport, and that's a fact," said the smith.

"Sport!" she cried, with shrill contempt and anger. "Tell me when all is over." She hurried away, and I saw her afterward seated among the bracken, her back turned toward the multitude and her hands over her ears, cowering and wincing in an agony of apprehension.

While this hurried scene had been taking place the crowd had become more and more tumultuous, partly from their impatience at the delay and partly from their exuberant spirits at the unexpected chance of seeing so celebrated a fighting man as Harrison. His identity had already been noised abroad, and many an elderly connoisseur plucked his long net purse out of his fob, in order to put a few guineas upon the man who would represent the school of the past against the present. The younger men were still in favour of the west country man, and small odds were to be had either way in proportion to the number of the supporters of each in the different parts of the crowd.

In the meantime Sir Lothian Hume had come bustling up to the Honourable Berkeley Craven, who was still standing near our curricule.

"I beg to lodge a formal protest against these proceedings," said he.

"On what grounds, sir?"

"Because the man produced is not the original nominee of Sir Charles Tregellis."

"I never named one, as you are well aware," said my uncle.

"The betting has all been upon the understanding that young Jim Harrison was my man's opponent. Now at the last moment he is withdrawn and another and more formidable man put into his place."

"Sir Charles Tregellis is quite within his rights," said Craven firmly. "He undertook to produce a man who should be within the age limits stipulated, and I understand that Harrison fulfils all the conditions.—You are over five and thirty, Harrison?"

"Forty-one next month, master."

"Very good. I direct that the fight proceed."

But alas! there was one authority which was higher even than that of the referee, and we were destined to an experience which was the prelude, and sometimes the conclusion also, of many an old-time fight. Across the moor there had ridden a black-coated gentleman with buff-topped hunting boots and a couple of grooms behind him, the little knot of horsemen showing up clearly upon the curving swells and dipping down into the alternate hollows. Some of the more observant of the crowd had glanced suspiciously at this advancing figure, but the majority had not observed him at all until he reined up his horse upon a knoll which overlooked the amphitheatre, and in a stentorian voice announced that he represented the custos rotulorum of his Majesty's county of Surrey, that he proclaimed this assembly to be gathered for an illegal purpose, and that he was commissioned to disperse it by force if necessary.

Never before had I understood that deep-seated fear and wholesome respect which many centuries of bludgeoning at the hands of the law had beaten into the fierce and turbulent natives of these islands. Here was a man with two attendants upon one side, and on the other thirty thousand very angry and disappointed people, many of them fighters by profession, and some from the roughest and most dangerous classes in the country. And yet it was the single man who appealed confidently to force, while the huge multitude swayed and murmured like a mutinous fierce-willed creature brought face to face with a power against which it knew there was neither argument nor resistance. My uncle, however, with Berkeley Craven, Sir John Lade, and a dozen other lords and gentlemen, hurried across to the interrupter of the sport.

“I presume that you have a warrant, sir?” said Craven.

“Yes, sir, I have a warrant.”

“Then I have a legal right to inspect it.”

The magistrate handed him a blue paper, which the little knot of gentlemen clustered their heads over, for they were mostly magistrates themselves, and were keenly alive to any possible flaw in the wording. At last Craven shrugged his shoulders and handed it back.

“This seems to be correct, sir,” said he.

“It is entirely correct,” answered the magistrate affably.—“To prevent waste of your valuable time, gentlemen, I may say once for all that it is my unalterable determination that no fight shall, under any circumstances, be brought off in the county over which I have control, and I am prepared to follow you all day in order to prevent it.”

To my inexperience this appeared to bring the whole matter to a conclusion, but I had underrated the foresight of those who arrange these affairs, and also the advantages which made Crawley Down so favourite a rendezvous. There was a hurried consultation between the principals, the backers, the referee, and the time-keeper.

“It’s seven miles to Hampshire border and about six to Sussex,” said Jackson. The famous master of the ring was clad in honour of the occasion in a most resplendent scarlet coat, worked in gold at the buttonholes, a white stock, a looped hat with a broad black band, buff knee breeches, white silk stockings and paste buckles—a costume which did justice to his magnificent figure and especially to those famous “balustrade” calves which had helped him to be the finest runner and jumper as well as the most formidable pugilist in England. His hard, high-boned face, large, piercing eyes, and immense physique made him a fitting leader for that rough and tumultuous body who had named him as their commander-in-chief.

“If I might venture to offer you a word of advice,” said the affable official, “it would be to make for the Hampshire line, for Sir James Ford on the Sussex border has as great an objection to such assemblies as I have, while Mr. Merridew, of Long Hall, who is the Hampshire magistrate, has fewer scruples upon the point."

"Sir," said my uncle, raising his hat in his most impressive manner, "I am infinitely obliged to you. With the referee's permission there is nothing for it but to shift the stakes."

In an instant a scene of the wildest animation had set in. Tom Owen and his assistant, Fogo, with the help of the ringkeepers, plucked up the stakes and ropes and carried them off across country. Crab Wilson was enveloped in great-coats and borne away in the barouche, while Champion Harrison took Mr. Craven's place in our curricule. Then off the huge crowd started, horsemen, vehicles, and pedestrians, rolling slowly over the broad face of the moorland. The carriages rocked and pitched like boats in a sea-way as they lumbered along, fifty abreast, scrambling and lurching over everything which came in their way. Sometimes with a snap and a thud one axle would come to the ground, while a wheel reeled off amid the tussocks of heather, and roars of delight greeted the owners as they looked ruefully at the ruin. Then as the gorse-clumps grew thinner and the sward more level, those on foot began to run, the riders struck in their spurs, the drivers cracked their whips, and away they all streamed in the maddest, wildest cross-country steeple chase, the yellow barouche and the crimson curricule, which held the two champions, leading the van.

"What do you think of your chances, Harrison?" I heard my uncle ask, as the two mares picked their way over the broken ground.

"It's my last fight, Sir Charles," said the smith. "You heard the missus say that if she let me off this time I was never to ask again. I must try and make it a good one."

"But your training?"

"I'm always in training, sir! I work hard from morning to night, and I drink little else than water. I don't think that Captain Barclay can do much better with all his rules."

"He's rather long in the reach for you."

"I've fought and beaten them that were longer. If it comes to a rally I should hold my own, and I should have the better of him at a throw."

"It's a match of youth against experience. Well, I would not hedge a guinea of my money. But unless he was acting under force I can not forgive young Jim for having deserted me."

"He was acting under force, Sir Charles."

"You have seen him, then?"

"No, master, I have not seen him."

"You know where he is?"

“ Well, it is not for me to say one way or the other. I can only tell you that he could not help himself. But here’s the beak a-comin’ for us again.”

The ominous figure galloped up once more alongside of our curricl, but this time his mission was a more amiable one.

“ My jurisdiction ends at that ditch, sir,” said he. “ I should fancy that you could hardly wish a better place for a mill than the sloping field beyond. I am quite sure that no one will interfere with you there.”

His anxiety that the fight should be brought off was in such contrast to the zeal with which he had chased us from his county that my uncle could not help remarking upon it.

“ It is not for a magistrate to wink at the breaking of the law, sir,” he answered, “ but if my colleague of Hampshire has no scruples about its being brought off within his jurisdiction I should very much like to see the fight,” with which he spurred his horse up an adjacent knoll, from which he thought that he might gain the best view of the proceedings.

And now I had a view of all those points of etiquette and curious survivals of custom which are so recent that we have not yet appreciated that they may some day be as interesting to the social historian as they then were to the sportsman. A dignity was given to the contest by a rigid code of ceremony, just as the clash of mail-clad knights was prefaced and adorned by the calling of the heralds and the showing of blazoned shields. To many in those ancient days the tourney may have seemed a bloody and brutal ordeal, but we who look at it with ample perspective see that it was a rude but gallant preparation for the conditions of life in an iron age. And so also when the ring has become as extinct as the lists we may understand that a broader philosophy would show that all things which spring up so naturally and spontaneously have a function to fulfil, and that it is a less evil that two men should, of their own free will, fight until they can fight no more, than that the standard of hardihood and endurance should run the slightest risk of being lowered in a nation which depends so largely upon the individual qualities of her citizens for her defence. Do away with war, if the cursed thing can, by any wit of man, be avoided, but until you see your way to that, have a care in meddling with those primitive qualities to which at any moment you may have to appeal for your own protection.

Tom Owen and his singular assistant, Fogo, who combined the functions of prize-fighter and of poet, though, fortunately for himself, he could use his fists better than his pen, soon had the ring arranged according to the rules then in vogue. The white wooden posts, each with the P. C. of the Pugilistic Club printed on it, were so fixed as to leave a square of twenty-four feet within the roped inclosure. Outside this ring an outer one was pitched, eight feet separating the two. The inner was for the combatants and for their seconds, while in the outer there were places for the referee, the timekeeper, the backers, and a few select and fortunate individuals, of whom, through being in my uncle's company, I was one. Some twenty well-known prize-fighters, including my friend Bill Warr, Black Richmond, Maddox, the Pride of Westminster, Tom Belcher, Paddington Jones, Tough Tom Blake, Symonds the Ruffian, Tyne the Tailor, and others were stationed in the outer ring as beaters-out.

These fellows all wore the high white hats, which were at that time much affected by the fancy, and they were armed with horsewhips, silver mounted, and each bearing the P. C. monogram. Did any one, be it East End rough or West End patrician, intrude within the outer ropes, this corps of guardians neither argued nor expostulated, but they fell upon the offender and laced him with their whips until he escaped back out of the forbidden ground. Even with so formidable a guard and such fierce measures the beaters-out who had to check the forward heaves of a maddened straining crowd were often as exhausted at the end of a fight as the principals themselves. In the meantime they formed up in a line of sentinels, presenting under their row of white hats every type of fighting face, from the fresh boyish countenances of Tom Belcher, Jones, and the other younger recruits, to the scarred and mutilated visages of the veteran bruisers.

While the business of the fixing of the stakes and the fastening of the ropes was going forward, I from my place of vantage could hear the talk of the crowd behind me, the front two rows of which were lying upon the grass, the next two kneeling, and the others standing in serried ranks all up the side of the gently sloping hill, so that each line could just see over the shoulders of that which was in front. There were several, and those among the most experienced, who took the gloomiest view of Harrison's chances, and it made my heart heavy to overhear them.

"It's the old story over again," said one. "They won't bear in mind that youth will be served. They only learn wisdom when it's knocked into them."

"Ay, ay," responded another. "That's how Jack Slack thrashed Boughton, and I myself saw Hooper, the tinman, beat to pieces by the fighting oilman. They all come to it in time, and now it's Harrison's turn."

"Don't you be so sure about that," cried a third. "I've seen Jack Harrison fight five times, and I never yet saw him have the worst of it. He's a slaughterer, and so I tell you."

"He was, you mean."

"Well, I don't see no such difference as all that comes to, and I'm putting ten guineas on my opinion."

"Why," said a loud, consequential man from immediately behind me, speaking with a broad western burr, "vrom what I've zeen of this young Gloucester lad I doan't think Harrison could have stood bevore him for ten rounds when he was in his prime. I vas coming up in the Bristol coach yesterday, and the guard he told me that he had vifteen thousand pound in hard gold in the boot that had been zent up to back our man."

"They'll be in luck if they see their money again," said another. "Harrison's no lady's maid fighter, and he's blood to the bone. He'd have a shy at it if his man was as big as Carlton House."

"Tut!" answered the west country man. "It's only in Bristol and Gloucester that you can get men to beat Bristol and Gloucester."

"It's like your damned himpudence to say so!" said an angry voice from the throng behind him. "There are six men in London that would hengage to walk round the best twelve that hever came from the west!"

The proceedings might have opened by an impromptu by-battle between the indignant cockney and the gentleman from Bristol, but a prolonged roar of applause broke in upon their altercation. It was caused by the appearance in the ring of Crab Wilson, followed by Dutch Sam and Mendoza, carrying the basin, sponge, brandy bladder, and other badges of their office.

As he entered, Wilson pulled the canary-yellow handkerchief from his waist, and going to the corner post he tied it to the top of it, where it remained fluttering in the breeze. He then took a bundle of smaller ribbons of the same colour from his seconds, and walking round he offered them to the noblemen and Corinthians at half a guinea a piece as souvenirs of the fight. His brisk trade was only brought to an end by the appearance of Harrison, who climbed in a very leisurely manner over the ropes as befitted his more mature years and less elastic joints.

The yell which greeted him was even more enthusiastic than that which had heralded Wilson, and there was a louder ring of admiration in it, for the crowd had already had their opportunity of seeing Wilson's physique, while Harrison's was a surprise to them.

I had often looked upon the mighty arms and neck of the smith, but I had never before seen him stripped to the waist, or understood the marvellous symmetry of development which had made him in his youth the favourite model of the London sculptors. There was none of that white, sleek skin and shimmering play of sinew which made Wilson a beautiful picture, but in its stead there was a rugged grandeur of knotted and tangled muscle, as though the roots of some old tree were writhing from breast to shoulder and from shoulder to elbow. Even in repose the sun threw shadows upon the curves of his skin, but when he exerted himself every muscle bunched itself up, distinct and hard, breaking his whole trunk into gnarled knots of sinew. His skin, on face and body, was darker and harsher than that of his youthful antagonist, but he looked tougher and harder, an effect which was increased by the sombre colour of his stockings and breeches. He entered the ring, sucking a lemon, with Jem Belcher and Caleb Baldwin the coster at his heels. Strolling across to the post, he tied his blue bird's-eye handkerchief over the west country yellowman, and then walked to his opponent with his hand out.

"I hope I see you well, Wilson," said he.

"Pretty tidy, I thank you," answered the other. "We'll speak to each other in a different fashion, I 'spects, afore we part."

"But no ill-feeling," said the smith, and the two fighting men grinned at each other as they took their own corners.

"May I ask, Mr. Referee, whether these two men have been weighed?" asked Sir Lothian Hume, standing up in the outer ring.

"Their weight has just been taken under my supervision, sir," answered Mr. Craven. "Your man brought the scales down at thirteen three and Harrison at thirteen eight."

"He's a fifteen-stoner from the loins upward," cried Dutch Sam from his corner. "We'll get some of it off him before we finish."

"You'll get more off him than ever you bargained for," answered Jem Belcher, and the crowd laughed at the rough chaff.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE SMITH'S LAST BATTLE.

"CLEAR the outer ring!" cried Jackson, standing up beside the ropes with a big silver watch in his hand.

"Ss—whack! ss—whack! ss—whack!" went the horsewhips, for a number of the spectators, either driven onward by the pressure behind or willing to risk some physical pain on the chance of getting a better view, had crept under the ropes and formed a ragged fringe within the outer ring. Now amid roars of laughter from the crowd and a shower of blows from the beaters-out they dived madly back with the ungainly haste of frightened sheep blundering through a gap in their hurdles. Their case was a hard one, for the folk in front refused to yield an inch of their places, but the arguments from the rear prevailed over everything else, and presently every frantic fugitive had been absorbed, while the beaters-out took their stands along the edge at regular intervals with their whips held down by their thighs.

"Gentlemen," cried Jackson again, "I am requested to inform you that Sir Charles Tregellis's nominee is Jack Harrison, fighting at thirteen eight, and Sir Lothian Hume's is Crab Wilson, at thirteen three. No person can be allowed at the inner ropes save the referee and the time-keeper. I have only to beg that if the occasion should require it you will all give your assistance to keep the ground clear, to prevent confusion and to have a fair fight. All ready?"

"All ready," from both corners.

"Time!"

There was a breathless hush as Harrison, Wilson, Belcher, and Dutch Sam walked briskly into the centre of the ring. The two men shook hands, while their seconds did the same, the four hands crossing each other. Then the seconds dropped back, and the two champions stood toe to toe, with their hands up.

It was a magnificent sight to any one who had not lost his sense of appreciation of the noblest of all the works of Nature. Both men fulfilled that requisite of the powerful athlete that they should look larger without their clothes than with them. In ring slang, they buffed well. And each showed up the other's points on account of the extreme contrast between them, the long, loose-limbed, deer-footed youngster, and the square-set rugged veteran, with his trunk like the stump of an oak. The betting began to rise upon the younger man from the instant that they were put face to face, for his advantages were obvious, while those qualities which had brought Harrison to the top in his youth were only a memory in the minds of the older men. All could see the three inches extra of height and two of reach which Wilson possessed, and a glance at the quick, catlike motions of his feet, and the perfect poise of his body upon his legs, showed how swiftly he could spring either in or out from his slower adversary. But it took a subtler insight to read the grim smile which flickered over the smith's mouth, or the smouldering fire which shone in his gray eyes, and it was only the old-timers who knew that with his mighty heart and his iron frame he was a perilous man to lay odds against.

Wilson stood in the position from which he had derived his nickname, his left hand and left foot well to the front, his body sloped very far back from his loins, and his guard thrown across his chest, but held well forward, in a way which made him exceedingly hard to get at. The smith, on the other hand, assumed the obsolete attitude which Humphries and Mendoza introduced, but which had not for ten years been seen in a first-class battle. Both his knees were slightly bent, he stood square to his opponent, and his two big brown fists were held over his mark, so that he could lead equally with either. Wilson's hands, which moved incessantly in and out, had been stained with some astringent juice, with the purpose of preventing them from puffing, and so great was the contrast between them and his white forearms that I imagined that he was wearing dark, close-fitting gloves, until my uncle explained the matter in a whisper. So they stood in a quiver of eagerness and expectation, while that huge multitude hung so silently and breathlessly upon every motion that they might have believed themselves to be alone, man to man, in the centre of some primeval solitude.

It was evident from the beginning that Crab Wilson meant to throw no chance away, and that he would trust to his lightness of foot and quickness of foot until he should see something of the tactics of his rough-looking antagonist. He paced swiftly round several times, with little elastic, menacing steps, while the smith pivoted slowly to correspond. Then as Wilson took a backward step to induce Harrison to break ground and follow him, the older man grinned and shook his head.

"You must come to me, lad," said he. "I'm too old to scamper round the ring after you. But we have the day before us and I'll wait."

He may not have expected his invitation to be so promptly answered, but in an instant, with a panther spring, the west countryman was on him. Smack! smack! smack! Thud! thud! The first three were on Harrison's face, the last two were heavy counters upon Wilson's body. Back danced the youngster, disengaging himself in beautiful style, but with two angry red blotches over the lower line of his ribs. "Blood for Wilson!" yelled the crowd, and as the smith faced round to follow the movements of his nimble adversary, I saw with a thrill that his chin was crimson and dripping. In came Wilson again with a feint at the mark and a flush hit on Harrison's cheek; then, breaking the force of the smith's ponderous right counter, he brought the round to a conclusion by slipping down upon the grass.

"First knock-down for Harrison!" roared a thousand voices, for as many pounds would change hands upon the point.

"I appeal to the referee!" cried Sir Lothian Hume. "It was a slip and not a knock-down."

"I give it a slip," said Berkeley Craven, and the men walked to their corners amid a general shout of applause for a spirited and well-contested opening round. Harrison fumbled in his mouth with his finger and thumb, and then with a sharp turn he wrenched out a tooth which he threw into the basin. "Quite like old times," said he to Belcher.

"Have a care, Jack!" whispered the anxious second. "You got rather more than you gave."

"Maybe I can carry more, too," said he serenely, while Caleb Baldwin mopped the big sponge over his face, and the shining bottom of the tin basin ceased suddenly to glimmer through the water.

I could gather from the comments of the experienced Corinthians around me, and from the remarks of the crowd behind, that Harrison's chance was thought to have been lessened by this round.

"I've seen his old faults and I haven't seen his old merits," said Sir John Lade, our opponent of the Brighton road. "He's as slow on his feet and with his guard as ever. Wilson hit him as he liked."

"Wilson may hit him three times to his once, but his one is worth Wilson's three," remarked my uncle. "He's a natural fighter, and the other an excellent sparrer, but I don't hedge a guinea."

A sudden hush announced that the men were on their feet again, and so skilfully had the seconds done their work that neither looked a jot the worse for what had passed. Wilson led viciously with his left, but misjudged his distance, receiving a smashing counter on the mark in reply, which sent him reeling and gasping to the ropes. "Hurrah for the old one!" yelled the mob, and my uncle laughed and nudged Sir John Lade. The west countryman smiled and shook himself like a dog from the water, as with a stealthy step he came back to the centre of the ring, where his man was still standing. Bang came Harrison's right upon the mark once more, but Crab broke the blow with his elbow, and jumped laughing away. Both men were a little winded and their quick, high breathing, with the light patter of their feet as they danced round each other, blended into one continuous, long-drawn sound. Two simultaneous exchanges with the left made a clap like a pistol-shot, and then as Harrison rushed in for a fall, Wilson slipped him and over went my old friend upon his face, partly from the impetus of his own futile attack and partly from a swinging half-arm blow which the west countryman brought home upon his ear as he passed.

"Knock-down for Wilson!" cried the referee, and the answering roar was like the broadside of a seventy-four. Up went hundreds of curly-brimmed Corinthian hats into the air, and the slope before us was a bank of flushed and yelling faces. My heart was cramped with my fears, and I winced at every blow, yet I was conscious also of an absolute fascination, with a wild thrill of fierce joy and a certain exultation in our common human nature which could rise above pain and fear in its straining after the very humblest form of fame.

Belcher and Baldwin had pounced upon their man, and had him up and in his corner in an instant, but, in spite of the coolness with which the hardy smith took his punishment there was immense exultation among the west countrymen.

"We've got him! He's beat! He's beat!" shouted the two Jew seconds. "It's a hundred to a tizzy on Gloucester!"

"Beat, is he?" answered Belcher. "You'll need to rent this field before you can beat him, for he'll stand a month of that kind of fly-flappin'." He was swinging a towel in front of Harrison as he spoke, while Baldwin mopped him with the sponge.

"How is it with you, Harrison?" asked my uncle.

"Hearty as a buck, sir. It's as right as the day."

The cheery answer came with so merry a ring that the clouds cleared from my uncle's face.

"You should recommend your man to lead more, Tregellis," said Sir John Lade. "He'll never win it unless he leads."

"He knows more about the game than you or I do, mon ami! I'll let him take his own way."

"The betting is three to one against him now," said a gentleman, whose grizzled mustache showed that he was an officer of the late war.

"Very true, General Fitzpatrick. But you'll observe that it is the raw young bloods who are giving the odds, and the sheenies who are taking them. I still stick to my opinion."

The two men came briskly up to the scratch at the call of time, the smith a little lumpy on one side of his head, but with the same good-humoured and yet menacing smile upon his lips. As to Wilson, he was exactly as he had begun in appearance, but twice I saw him close his lips sharply as if he were in a sudden spasm of pain, and the blotches over his ribs were darkening from scarlet to a sullen mottled purple. He held his guard somewhat lower, to screen this vulnerable point, and he danced round his opponent with a lightness that showed that his wind had not been impaired by the body blows, while the smith still adopted the impassive tactics with which he had commenced.

Many rumours had come up to us from the west as to Crab Wilson's fine science and the quickness of his hitting, but the truth surpassed what had been expected of him. In this round and the two which followed he showed a swiftness and accuracy which old ringsiders declared that Mendoza in his prime had never surpassed. He was in and out like lightning, and his blows were heard and felt rather than seen. But Harrison still took them all with the same dogged smile, occasionally getting in a hard body blow in return, for his adversary's height and his position combined to keep his face out of danger. At the end of the fifth round the odds were four to one, and the west countrymen were riotous in their exultation.

"What think you now?" cried the west countryman behind me, and in his excitement he could get no further save to repeat over and over, "What think you now?" When in the sixth round the smith was peppered twice without getting in a counter, and had the worst of the fall as well, the fellow became inarticulate altogether and could only huzza wildly in his delight. Sir Lothian Hume was smiling and nodding his head, while my uncle was coldly impassive, though I was as sure that his heart was as heavy as mine.

"This won't do, Tregellis," said General Fitzpatrick. "My money is on the old one, but the other is the finer boxer."

"My man is un peu passe, but he will come through all right," answered my uncle.

I saw that both Belcher and Baldwin were looking grave, and I knew that we must have a change of some sort, or the old tale of youth and age would be told once more.

The seventh round, however, showed the reserve strength of the hardy old fighter and lengthened the faces of those layers of odds who had imagined that the fight was practically over and that a few finishing rounds would have given the smith his coup de grâce. It was clear when the two men faced each other that Wilson had made himself up for mischief, and meant to force the fighting and maintain the lead which he had gained, but that gay gleam was not quenched in the veteran's eyes, and still the same smile played over his grim face. He had become more jaunty, too, in the swing of his shoulders and the poise of his head, and it brought my confidence back to me to see the brisk way in which he squared up to his man.

Wilson led with his left, but was short, and he only just avoided a dangerous right-hander, which whistled in at his ribs. "Bravo, old 'un! one of those will be a dose of laudanum if you get it home," cried Belcher. There was a pause of shuffling feet and hard breathing, broken by the thud of a tremendous body blow from Wilson, which the smith stopped with the utmost coolness. Then again a few seconds of silent tension, when Wilson led viciously at the head, but Harrison took it on his forearm, smiling and nodding at his opponent. "Get the pepperbox open!" yelled Mendoza, and Wilson sprang in to carry out his instructions, but was hit out again by a heavy drive on the chest. "Now's the time! Follow it up!" cried Belcher, and in rushed the smith, pelting in his half-arm blows and taking the returns without a wince until Crab Wilson went down exhausted in the corner. Both men had their marks to show, but Harrison had all the best of the rally, so it was our turn to throw our hats into the air and to shout ourselves hoarse, while the seconds clapped their man upon his broad back as they hurried him to his corner.

“What think you now?” shouted all the neighbours of the west countryman, repeating his own refrain.

“Why, Dutch Sam never put in a better rally,” cried Sir John Lade. “What’s the betting now, Sir Lothian?”

“I have laid all that I intend, but I don’t think my man can lose it.” For all that, the smile had faded from his face, and I observed that he glanced continually over his shoulder into the crowd behind him.

A sullen purple cloud had been drifting slowly up from the southwest, though I dare say that out of thirty thousand folk there were very few who had spared the time or attention to mark it. Now it suddenly made its presence apparent by a few heavy drops of rain, thickening rapidly into a sharp shower which filled the air with its hiss, and rattled noisily upon the hard high hats of the Corinthians. Coat collars were turned up and handkerchiefs tied around necks, while the skins of the two men glistened with the moisture as they stood up to each other once more. I noticed that Belcher whispered very earnestly into Harrison’s ear as he rose from his knee, and that the smith nodded his head curtly with the air of a man who understands and approves his orders.

And what those orders were was instantly apparent. Harrison was to be turned from the defender into the attacker. The result of the rally in the last round had convinced his seconds that when it came to give-and-take hitting their hardy and powerful man was likely to have the better of it. And then on the top of this came the rain. With the slippery grass the superior activity of Wilson would be neutralized, and he would find it harder to avoid the rushes of his opponent. It was in taking advantage of such circumstances that the art of ringcraft lay, and many a shrewd and vigilant second had won a losing battle for his man. "Go in, then! Go in!" whooped the two prize-fighters, while every backer in the crowd took up the roar.

And Harrison went in, in such fashion that no man who saw him do it will ever forget it. Crab Wilson, as game as a pebble, met him with a flush hit every time, but no human strength or human science seemed capable of stopping the terrible onslaught of this iron man. Round after round he scrambled his way in, Slap! Bang! right and left, every hit tremendously sent home. Sometimes he covered his own face with his left, and sometimes he disdained to use any guard at all, but his springing hits were irresistible. The rain lashed down upon them, pouring from their faces and running in crimson trickles over their bodies, but neither gave any heed to it save to manœuvre always with the view of bringing it into each other's eyes. But round after round the west countryman fell, and round after round the betting rose until the odds were higher in our favour than ever they had been against us. With a sinking heart, filled with pity and admiration for these two gallant men, I longed that every bout might be the last, and yet the "Time!" was hardly out of Jackson's mouth before they had both sprung from their seconds' knees with laughter upon their mutilated faces and chaffing words upon their bleeding lips.

It may have been a humble object lesson, but I give you my word that many a time in my life I have braced myself to a hard task by the remembrance of that morning upon Crawley Downs, asking myself if my manhood were so weak that I could not do for my country or for those whom I loved as much as these two would do for a paltry stake, and for their own credit among their fellows. Such a spectacle may brutalize those who are brutal, but I say that there is a spiritual side to it also, and that the sight of the utmost human limit of endurance and courage is one which bears a lesson of its own.

But if the ring can breed bright virtues it is but a partisan who can deny that it can be the mother of black vices also, and we were destined that morning to have a sight of each. It so chanced that as the battle went against his man my eyes stole round very often to note the expression upon Sir Lothian Hume's face, for I knew how fearlessly he had laid the odds, and I understood that his fortunes as well as his champion were going down before the swashing blows of the old bruiser.

The confident smile with which he had watched the opening rounds had long vanished from his lips, and his cheeks had turned of a sallow pallor, while his small beadlike gray eyes looked furtively from under his craggy brows, and more than once he burst into savage imprecations when Wilson was beaten to the ground. But especially I noticed that his chin was always coming round to his shoulder, and that at the end of every round he sent keen little glances flying backward into the crowd. For some time amid the immense hillside of faces which banked themselves up on the slope behind us I was unable to pick out the exact point at which his gaze was directed. But at last I succeeded in following it.

A very tall man, who showed a pair of broad bottle-green shoulders high above his neighbours, was looking very hard in our direction, and I assured myself that a quick exchange of almost imperceptible signals was going on between him and the Corinthian baronet. I became conscious also as I watched this stranger that the cluster of men around him were the roughest elements of the whole assembly—fierce, vicious-looking fellows, with cruel, debauched faces, who howled like a pack of wolves at every blow, and yelled execrations at Harrison whenever he walked across to his corner. So turbulent were they that I saw the ringkeepers whisper together and glance up in their direction, as if preparing for trouble in store, but none of them had realized how near it was to breaking out, or how dangerous it might prove.

Thirty rounds had been fought in an hour and twenty-five minutes, and the rain was pelting down harder than ever. A thick steam rose from the two fighters, and the ring was a pool of mud. Repeated falls had turned the men brown, with a horrible mottling of crimson blotches. Round after round had ended by Crab Wilson going down, and it was evident even to my inexperienced eye that he was weakening rapidly. He leaned heavily upon the two Jews when they led him to his corner, and he reeled when their support was withdrawn. Yet his science had through long practice become an automatic thing with him, so that he stopped and hit with less power but with as great accuracy as ever. Even now a casual observer might have thought that he had the best of the battle, for the smith was far the more horribly marked, but there was a wild stare in the west countryman's eyes and a strange catch in his breathing which told us that it is not the most dangerous blow which shows upon the surface. A heavy cross-buttock at the end of the thirty-first round shook the breath from his body, and he came up for the thirty-second with the same jaunty gallantry as ever, but with the dazed expression of a man whose wind has been utterly smashed.

"He's got the roly-polies!" cried Belcher. "You have it your own way now!"

"I'll vight for a week yet!" gasped Wilson.

"Damme! I like his style," cried Sir John Lade. "No shifting, nothing shy, no hugging nor hauling. It's a shame to let him fight. Take the brave fellow away!"

"Take him away! Take him away!" echoed a hundred voices.

"I von't be taken away! Who dares say so?" cried Wilson, who was back after another fall upon his second's knee.

"His heart won't suffer him to cry 'Enough!'" said General Fitzpatrick. "As his patron, Sir Lothian, you should direct the sponge to be thrown up."

"You think he can't win it?"

"He is hopelessly beat, sir."

"You don't know him. He's a glutton of the first water."

"A gamer man never pulled his shirt off, but the other is too strong for him."

"Well, sir, I believe that he can fight another ten rounds." He half turned as he spoke, and I saw him throw up his left arm with a singular gesture into the air.

"Cut the ropes! Fair play! Wait till the rain stops!" roared a stentorian voice behind me, and I saw that it came from the big man with the bottle-green coat. His cry was a signal, for, like a thunderclap, there came a hundred voices shouting together: "Fair play for Gloucester! Break the ring! Break the ring!"

Jackson had called "Time!" and the two mud-plastered men were already upon their feet, but the interest had suddenly changed from the fight to the audience. A succession of heaves from the back of the crowd had sent a series of long ripples running through it, all the heads swaying rhythmically in one direction like a wheatfield in a squall. With every impulsion the oscillation increased, those in front trying vainly to steady themselves against the rushes from behind, until suddenly there came a sharp snap, two white stakes with earth clinging to their points flew into the outer ring, and a spray of people, dashed from the solid wave behind, were thrown against the line of beaters-out. Down came the long horsewhips, swayed by the most vigorous arms in England, but the wincing and shouting victims had no sooner scrambled back a few yards from the merciless cuts before a fresh charge from the rear hurled them once more into the arms of the prize-fighters.

Many threw themselves down upon the turf and allowed successive waves to pass over their bodies, while others, driven wild by the blows, returned them with their hunting crops and walking canes. And then, as half the crowd strained to the left and half to the right to avoid the pressure from behind, the vast mass was suddenly reft in twain, and through the gap surged the rough fellows from behind, all armed with loaded sticks, and yelling for "Fair play and Gloucester!" Their determined rush carried the prize-fighters before them, the inner ropes snapped like threads, and in an instant the ring was a swirling, seething mass of figures, whips and sticks falling and clattering, while, face to face in the middle of all, so wedged that they could neither advance nor retreat, the smith and the west countryman continued their long-drawn battle, as oblivious of the chaos raging around them as two bulldogs who had got each other by the throat. The driving rain, the cursing and screams of pain, the swish of the blows, the yelling of orders and advice, the heavy smell of the damp cloth—every incident of that scene of my early youth comes back to me now, in my old age, as clearly as if it had been but yesterday.

It was not easy for us to observe anything at the time, however, for we were ourselves in the midst of the frantic crowd, swaying about and carried occasionally quite off our feet, but endeavouring to keep our places behind Jackson and Berkeley Craven, who, with sticks and whips meeting over their heads, were still calling the rounds and superintending the fight.

“The ring’s broken!” shouted Sir Lothian Hume. “I appeal to the referee! The fight is null and void.”

“You villain!” cried my uncle, hotly. “This is your doing!”

"You have already an account to answer for with me," said Hume with his sinister sneer, and as he spoke he was swept by the rush of the crowd into my uncle's very arms. The two men's faces were not more than a few inches apart, and Sir Lothian's bold eyes had to sink before the imperious scorn which gleamed coldly in those of my uncle.

"We will settle our accounts, never fear, though I degrade myself by meeting such a blackleg.—What is it, Craven?"

"We shall have to declare a draw, Tregellis."

"My man has the fight in hand."

"I can not help it. I can not attend to my duties when every moment I am cut over with a whip or a stick."

Jackson suddenly made a wild dash into the crowd, but returned with empty hands and a rueful face.

"They've stolen my timekeeper's watch!" he cried. "A little cove snatched it out of my hand."

My uncle clapped his hand to his fob.

"Mine has gone also," he cried.

"Draw it at once or your man will get hurt," said Jackson. And we saw that as the undaunted smith stood up to Wilson for another round a dozen rough fellows were clustering round him with bludgeons.

“I hope I have not hurt you much.”

"Do you consent to a draw, Sir Lothian Hume?"

"I do."

"And you, Sir Charles?"

"Certainly not."

"The ring is gone."

"That is no fault of mine."

"Well, I see no help for it. As referee I order that the men be withdrawn, and that the stakes be returned to their owners."

"A draw! a draw!" shrieked every one, and the crowd in an instant dispersed in every direction, the pedestrians running to get a good lead upon the London road, and the Corinthians in search of their horses and carriages. Harrison ran over to Wilson's corner and shook him by the hand.

"I hope I have not hurt you much."

"I'm hard put to it to stand. How are you?"

"My head's singin' like a kettle. It was the rain that helped me."

"Yes, I thought I had you beaten one time. I never wish a better battle."

"Nor me, either. Good-by."

And so those two brave-hearted fellows made their way amid the yelping roughs, like two wounded lions amid a pack of wolves and jackals. I say again that if the ring has fallen low, it is not in the main the fault of the men who have done the fighting, but it lies at the door of ringside parasites and ruffians, who are as far below the honest pugilist as the welsher and the blackleg are below the noble race horse which serves them as a protest for their villainies.

CHAPTER XIX.

CLIFFE ROYAL.

My uncle was humanely anxious to get Harrison to bed as soon as possible, for the smith, although he laughed at his own injuries, had none the less been severely punished.

“Don’t you dare ever to ask my leave to fight again, Jack Harrison!” said his wife as she looked ruefully at his battered face. “Why, it’s worse than when you beat Black Baruk, and if it weren’t for your topcoat I couldn’t swear you were the man who led me to the altar. If the King of England ask you, I’ll never let you do it more!”

“Well, old lass, I give my davy that I never will. It’s best that I leave fightin’ before fightin’ leaves me.” He screwed up his face as he took a sup from Sir Charles’s brandy flask. “It’s fine liquor, sir, but it gets into my cut lips most cruel—Why, here’s John Cummings, of the Friar’s Oak Inn, as I’m a sinner, and seekin' for a mad doctor, to judge by the look of him."

It was certainly a most singular figure who was approaching us over the moor. With the flushed, dazed face of a man who is just recovering from recent intoxication, the landlord was tearing madly about, his hat gone, and his hair and beard flying in the wind. He ran in little zigzags from one knot of people to another, while his peculiar appearance drew a running fire of witticisms as he went so that he reminded me irresistibly of a snipe skimming along through a line of guns. We saw him stop for an instant by the yellow barouche and hand something to Sir Lothian Hume. Then on he came again, until at last catching sight of us he gave a cry of joy and ran for us full speed, with a note held out at arm's length.

"You're a nice cove, too, John Cummings," said Harrison, reproachfully. "Didn't I tell you not to let a drop pass your lips until you had given your message to Sir Charles?"

"I ought to be pole-axed, I ought," he cried, in bitter repentance. "I asked for you, Sir Charles, as I'm a livin' man I did, but you weren't there, and what with bein' so pleased at gettin' such odds when I knew Harrison was goin' to fight, an' what with the landlord at the George wantin' me to try his own specials, I let my senses go clear away from me. And now it's only after the fight is over that I see you, Sir Charles, an' if you lay that whip over my back it's only what I deserve."

But my uncle was paying no attention whatever to the voluble self-reproaches of the landlord. He had opened the note and was reading it with a slight raising of the eyebrows, which was almost the very highest note in his limited emotional gamut.

"What make you of this, nephew?" he asked, handing it to me.

This was what I read :

"SIR CHARLES TREGELLIS—For God's sake, come at once, when this reaches you, to Cliffe Royal, and tarry as little as possible upon the way! You will see me there, and you will hear much which concerns you deeply. I pray you to come as soon as may be, and until then I remain him whom you knew as

"JAMES HARRISON."

"Well, nephew?" asked my uncle.

"Why, sir, I can not tell what it may mean."

"Who gave it to you, sirrah?"

“It was young Jim Harrison himself, sir,” said the landlord, “though indeed I scarce knew him at first, for he looked like his own ghost. He was so eager that it would reach you that he would not leave me until the horse was harnessed and I started upon my way. There was one note for you and one for Sir Lothian Hume; and I wish to God he had chosen a better messenger!”

“This is a mystery, indeed,” said my uncle, bending his brows over the note. “What should he be doing at that house of ill-omen? And why does he sign himself ‘him whom you knew as Jim Harrison’?—By what other style should I know him?—Harrison, you can throw a light upon this!—You, Mrs. Harrison, I see by your face that you understand it!”

“Maybe we do, Sir Charles, but we are plain folk, my Jack and I, and we go as far as we see our way, and when we don’t see our way any longer we just stop. We’ve been goin’ this twenty year, but now we’ll draw aside and let our betters get to the front; so if you wish to find what that note means I can only advise you to do what you are asked, and to drive over to Cliffe Royal, where you will find out.”

My uncle put the note into his pocket.

"I don't move until I have seen you safely in the hands of the surgeon, Harrison."

"Never mind for me, sir. The missus and me can drive down to Crawley in the gig, and a yard of stickin' plaster and a raw steak will soon set me to rights."

But my uncle was by no means to be persuaded, and he drove the pair into Crawley—his wife in the very best quarters which money could procure. Then, after a hasty luncheon, we turned the mares' heads for the south.

"This ends my connection with the ring, nephew," said my uncle. "I perceive that there is no possible means by which it can be kept pure from roguery. I have been cheated and befooled; but a man learns wisdom at last, and never again do I give countenance to a prize-fight."

Had I been older or he less formidable, I might have said what was in my heart and begged him to give up other things also, to come out from those shallow circles in which he lived, and to find some work that was worthy of his strong brain and his good heart. But the thought had hardly formed itself in my mind before he had dropped his serious vein and was chatting away about some new silver-mounted harness which he intended to spring upon the Mall, and about the match for a thousand guineas which he meant to make between his filly Ethelberta and Lord Doncaster's famous three-year-old, Aurelius.

We had got as far as Whiteman's Green, which is rather more than midway between Crawley Down and Friar's Oak, when, looking backward, I saw far down the road the gleam of the sun upon a high, yellow carriage. Sir Lothian Hume was following us.

"He has had the same summons as we, and is bound for the same destination," said my uncle, glancing over his shoulder at the distant barouche. "We are both wanted at Cliffe Royal—we, the two survivors of that black business. And it is Jim Harrison of all people who calls us there. Nephew, I have had an eventful life, but I feel as if the very strangest scene of it were waiting for me among those trees."

He whipped up the mares, and now from the curve of the road we could see the high, dark pinnacles of the old manor house shooting up above the ancient oaks which ring it round. The sight of it with its blood-stained and ghost-blasted reputation would in itself have been enough to send a thrill through my nerves, but when the words of my uncle made me suddenly realize that this strange summons was indeed for the two men who were concerned in that old-world tragedy, and that it was the playmate of my youth who had sent it, I caught my breath as I seemed vaguely to catch a glimpse of some portentous thing forming itself in front of us. The rusted gates between the crumbling heraldic pillars were folded back, and my uncle flicked the mares impatiently as we flew up the weed-grown avenue, until he pulled them on their haunches before the time-blotched steps. The front door was open, and Boy Jim was waiting there to meet us.

But it was a different Boy Jim from him whom I had known and loved. There was a change in him somewhere—a change so marked that it was the first thing that I noticed, and yet so subtle that I could not put words to it. He was not better dressed than of old, for I well knew the old brown suit that he wore. He was not less comely, for his training had left him the very model of what a man should be. And yet there was a change, a touch of dignity in the expression, a suggestion of confidence in the bearing which seemed, now that it was supplied, to be the one thing which had been needed to give him harmony and finish. Somehow, in spite of his prowess, his old school name of “Boy” had clung very naturally to him, until that instant when I saw him standing in his self-contained and magnificent manhood in the doorway of the ancient house. A woman stood beside him, her hand resting upon his shoulder, and I saw that it was Miss Hinton, of Anstey Cross.

"You remember me, Sir Charles Tregellis," said she, coming forward, as we sprang down from the curriole.

My uncle looked hard at her with a puzzled face.

"I do not think that I have the privilege, madame. And yet——"

"Polly Hinton, of the Haymarket. You surely can not have forgotten Polly Hinton?"

"Forgotten! Why, we have mourned for you in Fop's Alley for more years than I care to think of. But what in the name of wonder——!"

"I was privately married and I retired from the stage. I want you to forgive me for taking Jim away from you last night."

"It was you, then?"

"I had a stronger claim even than you could have. You were his patron. I was his mother." She drew his head down to hers as she spoke, and there with their cheeks together were the two faces, the one stamped with the waning beauty of womanhood, the other with the waxing strength of man, and yet, so alike in the dark eyes, the blue-black hair, and the broad white brow, that I marvelled that I had never read her secret on the first days that I had seen them together. "Yes," she cried, "he is my own boy, and he saved me from what is worse than death, as your nephew Rodney could tell you. Yet my lips were sealed, and it was only last night that I could tell him that it was his mother whom he had brought back by his gentleness and his patience into the sweetness of life."

"Hush, mother!" said Jim, turning his lips to her cheek. "There are some things which are between ourselves.—But tell me, Sir Charles, how went the fight?"

"Your uncle would have won it, but the rougs broke the ring."

"He is no uncle of mine, Sir Charles, but he has been the best and truest friend both to me and my father that ever the world could afford. I only know one as true," he continued, taking me by the hand, "and dear old Rodney Stone is his name.—But I trust he was not much hurt?"

"A week or two will set him right. But I can not pretend to understand how this matter stands, and you must allow me to say that I have not heard you advance anything yet which seems to justify you in abandoning your engagements at a moment's notice."

"Come in, Sir Charles, and I am convinced that you will acknowledge that I could not have done otherwise.—But here, if I mistake not, is Sir Lothian Hume."

The yellow barouche had swung into the avenue, and a few moments later the weary, panting horses had pulled up behind our curricule. Sir Lothian sprang out, looking as black as a thundercloud.

"Stay where you are, Corcoran," said he, and I caught a glimpse of a bottle-green coat which told me who was his travelling companion. "Well," he continued, looking round him with an insolent stare, "I should vastly like to know who has the insolence to give me so pressing an invitation to visit my own house, and what in the devil you mean by daring to trespass upon my grounds!"

"I promise you that you will understand this and a good deal more before we part, Sir Lothian," said Jim, with a curious smile playing over his face. "If you will only follow me I will endeavour to make it all clear to you."

With his mother's hand in his own he led us into that ill-omened room, where the cards were still heaped upon the sideboard and the dark shadow lurked in the corner of the ceiling.

"Now, sirrah, your explanation!" cried Sir Lothian, standing, with his arms folded, by the door.

"My first explanation I owe to you, Sir Charles," said Jim, and as I listened to his voice and noted his manner I could not but admire the effect which the company of her whom he now knew to be his mother had had upon a rude country lad. "I wish to tell you what occurred last night."

"I will tell it for you, Jim," said his mother. —"You must know, Sir Charles, that though my son knew nothing of his parents, we were both alive, and had never lost sight of him. For my part, I let him have his own way in going to London and taking up this challenge. It was only yesterday that it came to the ears of his father, who would have none of it. He was in the weakest health, and his wishes were not to be gainsaid. He ordered me to go at once and to bring his son to his side. I was at my wits' end, for I was sure that Jim would never come unless a substitute were provided for him. I went to the kind, good couple who had brought him up, and I told him how matters stood.

"Mrs. Harrison loved Jim as if he had been her own son, and her husband loved mine, so they came to my help, and may God bless them for their kindness to a distracted wife and mother! Harrison would take Jim's place if Jim would go to his father. Then I drove to Crawley. I found out which was Jim's room, and I spoke to him through the window, for I was sure that those who had backed him would not let him go. I told him that I was his mother. I told him who was his father. I said that I had my phaeton ready, and that he might, for all I knew, be only in time to receive the dying blessing of that parent whom he had never known. Still the boy would not go until he had my assurance that Harrison would take his place."

"Why did he not leave a message with Belcher?"

"My head was in a whirl, Sir Charles. To find a father and a mother, a new name and a new rank in a few minutes, might turn a stronger brain than ever mine was. My mother begged me to come with her, and I went. The phaeton was waiting, but we had scarcely started when some fellow seized the horse's head and a couple of ruffians attacked us. One of them I beat over the head with the butt of the whip, so that he dropped the cudgel with which he was about to strike me ; then, lashing the horse, I shook off the others and got safely away. I can not imagine who they were or why they should molest us."

"Perhaps Sir Lothian Hume could tell you," said my uncle.

Our enemy said nothing, but his little gray eyes slid round with a most murderous glance in our direction.

"After I had come here and seen my father, I went down——"

My uncle stopped him with a cry of astonishment.

"What did you say, young man? You came here and you saw your father. Here at Cliffe Royal?"

"Yes, sir."

My uncle had turned very pale.

"In God's name then tell us who your father is!"

Jim made no answer, save to point over our shoulders, and glancing round we became aware that two people had entered the room through the door which led to the bedroom stair. The one I recognised in an instant. That impassive, masklike face and demure manner could only belong to Ambrose, the former valet of my uncle. The other was a very different and even more singular figure. He was a tall man, clad in a dark dressing-gown, and leaning heavily upon a stick. His long, bloodless countenance was so thin and so white that it gave the strangest illusion of transparency. Only within the folds of a shroud have I ever seen so wan a face. The brindled hair and the rounded back gave the impression of advanced age, and it was only the dark brows and the bright, alert eyes glancing out from beneath them which made me doubt whether it was really an old man who stood before us.

There was an instant of silence, broken by a deep oath from Sir Lothian Hume.

“Lord Avon, by God!” he cried.

“Very much at your service, gentlemen,” answered the strange figure in the dressing-gown.

CHAPTER XX.

LORD AVON.

MY uncle was an impassive man by nature, and had become more so by the tradition of the society in which he lived. He could have turned a card upon which his fortune depended without the twitch of a muscle, and I had seen him myself driving to imminent death on the Godstone road with as calm a face as if he were out for his daily airing in the Mall. But now the shock which had come upon him was so great that he could only stand with white cheeks and staring, incredulous eyes. Twice I saw him open his lips, and twice he put his hand up to his throat as though a barrier had risen between himself and his utterance. Finally, he took a sudden little run forward with both his hands thrown out in greeting.

“Ned!” he cried.

But the strange man who stood before him folded his arms over his breast.

"No, Charles," said he.

My uncle stopped and looked at him in amazement.

"Surely, Ned, you have a greeting for me after all these years!"

"You believed me to have done this deed, Charles. I read it in your eyes and in your manner on that terrible morning. You never asked me for an explanation. You never considered how impossible such a crime must be for a man of my character. At the first breath of suspicion you, my intimate friend, the man who knew me best, set me down as a thief and a murderer."

"No, no, Ned."

"You did, Charles. I read it in your eyes. And so it was that when I wished to leave that which was most precious to me in safe hands I had to pass you over and to place him in the charge of the one man who from the first never doubted my innocence. Better a thousand times that my son should be brought up in a humble station and in ignorance of his unfortunate father than that he should learn to share the doubts and suspicions of his equals!"

"Then he is really your son!" cried my uncle, staring at Jim in amazement.

withered arm and placed a gaunt hand upon the shoulder of the actress, while she looked up at him with love in her eyes.

“I married, Charles, and I kept it secret from my friends, for I had gone to the stage for my wife. You know the foolish pride which has always been the strongest part of my nature. I could not bear to avow that which I had done. It was this neglect upon my part which led to an estrangement between us, and drove her into habits for which it is I who am to blame and not she. Yet, on account of these same habits I took the child from her and gave her an allowance on condition that she did not interfere with it. I had feared that the boy might receive evil from her, and had never dreamed in my blindness that she might get good from him. But I have learned in my miserable life, Charles, that there is a power which fashions things for us, though we may strive to thwart it, and that we are in truth driven by an unseen current toward a certain goal, however much we may deceive ourselves into thinking that it is our own sails and oars which are speeding us upon our way.”

My eyes had been upon the face of my uncle as he listened, but now as I turned them from him they fell once more upon the thin, wolfish face of Sir Lothian Hume. He stood near the window, his gray silhouette thrown up against the square of dusty glass, and I have never seen such a play of evil passions, of anger, of jealousy, of disappointed greed, upon a human face before.

“Am I to understand,” said he, in a loud, harsh voice, “that this young man claims to be the heir of the peerage of Avon?”

“I knew you fairly well, sir, in our youth, but you will allow me to observe that neither I nor any friend of yours ever heard of a wife or son. I defy Sir Charles Tregellis to say that he ever dreamed that there was any heir except myself.”

“I have already explained, Sir Lothian, why I kept my marriage secret.”

“You have explained, sir, but it is for others in another place to say if that explanation is satisfactory.”

Two blazing dark eyes flashed out of the pale, haggard face with as strange and sudden an effect as if a stream of light were to beat through the windows of a shattered and ruined house.

“I demand a proof.”

“My word is proof to those who know me.”

“Excuse me, Lord Avon, but I know you, and I see no reason why I should accept your statement.”

Lord Avon staggered forward.

It was a brutal speech, and brutally delivered. Lord Avon staggered forward, and it was only his son on one side and his wife on the other who kept his quivering hands from the throat of his insulter. Sir Lothian recoiled from the pale, fierce face with the black brows, but he still glared angrily about the room.

“A very pretty conspiracy, this,” he cried, “with a criminal, an actress, and a prize-fighter all playing their parts.—Sir Charles Tregellis, you shall hear from me again!—And you, also, my lord!” He turned on his heel and strode from the room.

“He has gone to denounce me,” said Lord Avon, a spasm of wounded pride distorting his features.

“Shall I bring him back?” cried Boy Jim.

“No, no, let him go. It is as well, for I have already made up my mind that my duty to you, my son, outweighs that which I owe, and have at such bitter cost fulfilled to my brother and my family.”

“You did me an injustice, Ned,” said my uncle, “if you thought that I had forgotten you or I had judged you unkindly. If ever I have that thought that you had done this deed—and how could I doubt the evidence of my own eyes—I have always believed that it was at a time when your mind was unhinged, and when you knew no more of what you were about than the man who is walking in his sleep."

"What do you mean when you talk about the evidence of your own eyes?" asked Lord Avon, looking hard at my uncle.

"I saw you, Ned, upon that accursed night."

"Saw me? Where?"

"In the passage."

"And doing what?"

"You were coming from your brother's room. I had heard his voice raised in anger and pain only an instant before. You carried in your hand a bag full of money, and your face betrayed the utmost agitation. If you can but explain to me, Ned, how you came to be there, you will take from my heart a weight which has pressed upon it for years."

No one now would have recognised in my uncle the man who was the leader of all the fops of London. In the presence of this old friend and of the tragedy which girt him round the veil of triviality and affection had been rent, and I felt all my gratitude toward him deepening for the first time into affection while I watched his pale, anxious face, and the eager hope which shone in his eyes as he awaited his friend's explanation. Lord Avon sank his face in his hands, and for a few moments there was silence in the dim, gray room.

"I do not wonder now that you were shaken," said he at last. "My God, what a net was cast round me! Had this vile charge been brought against me, you, my dearest friend, would have been compelled to tear away the last doubt as to my guilt. And yet, in spite of what you have seen, Charles, I am as innocent in the matter as you are."

"I thank God that I hear you say so."

"But you are not satisfied, Charles. I can read it on your face. You wish to know why an innocent man should conceal himself for all these years."

"Your word is enough for me, Ned; but the world will wish this other question answered also."

"It was to save the family honour, Charles. You know how dear it was to me. I could not clear myself without proving my brother to have been guilty of the foulest crime which a gentleman could commit. For eighteen years I have screened him, at the expense of everything which a man could sacrifice. I have lived a living death, which has left me an old and shattered man, when I am but in my fortieth year. But now, when I am faced with the alternative of telling the facts about my brother or of wronging my son, I can only act in one fashion, and the more so since I have reason to hope that a way may be found by which what I am now about to disclose to you need never come to the public ear."

He rose from his chair, and, leaning heavily upon his two supporters, he tottered across the room to the dust-covered sideboard. There, in the centre of it, was lying that ill-boding pile of time-stained, mildewed cards, just as Boy Jim and I had seen them years before. Lord Avon turned them over with trembling fingers, and then, picking up half a dozen, he brought them to my uncle.

"Place your finger and thumb upon the left-hand bottom corner of this card, Charles," said he. "Pass them lightly backward and forward, and tell me what you feel."

"It has been pricked with a pin."

"Precisely. What is the card?"

My uncle turned it over.

"It is the king of clubs."

"Try the bottom corner of this one."

"It is quite smooth."

"And the card is——?"

"The three of spades."

"And this one?"

"It has been pricked. It is the ace of hearts."

Lord Avon hurled them down upon the floor.

"There, you have the whole accursed story!" he cried. "Need I go further, where every word is an agony?"

"I see something, but not all. You must continue, Ned."

The frail figure stiffened itself as though he were visibly bracing himself for an effort.

"I will tell it you then once and forever. Never again, I trust, will it be necessary for me to open my lips about the miserable business. You remember our game. You remember how we lost. You remember how you all retired and left me sitting in this very room and at that very table. Far from being tired, I was exceedingly wakeful, and I remained here for an hour or more, thinking over the incidents of the game and the changes which it promised to bring about in my fortunes. I had, as you will recollect, lost heavily, and my only consolation was that my own brother had won. I knew that owing to his reckless mode of life he was firmly in the clutches of the Jews, and I hoped that that which had shaken my position might have the effect of restoring his. As I sat there, fingering the cards in an abstracted way, some chance led me to observe the small needle pricks which you have just felt. I went over the packs and found, to my unspeakable horror, that any one who was in the secret could hold them in dealing in such a way as to be able to count the exact number of high cards which fell to each of his opponents. And then, with such a flush of shame and disgust as I had never known, I remembered how my attention had been drawn to my brother's mode of dealing, its slowness, and the way in which he held each card by the lower corner.

"I did not condemn him precipitately. I sat for a long time calling to mind every incident which could tell one way or the other. Alas! it all went to confirm me in my first horrible suspicion, and to turn it into a certainty. My brother had ordered the packs from Ledbury's in Bond Street. They had been for some hours in his chambers. He had played throughout with a decision which had surprised us at the time. Above all, I could not conceal from myself that his past life was not such as to make even so abominable a crime as this impossible to him. Tingling with anger and shame, I went straight up that stair, the cards in my hand, and I taxed him with this lowest and meanest of all the crimes to which a villain could descend.

"He had not retired to rest, and his ill-gotten gains were spread out upon the dressing table. I hardly know what I said to him, but the facts were so deadly that he did not attempt to deny his guilt. You will remember as the only mitigation of his crime that he was not yet one and twenty years of age. My words overwhelmed him. He went on his knees to me, imploring me to spare him. I told him that out of consideration for our family I should make no public exposure of him, but that he must never again in his life lay his hand upon a card, and that the money which he had won must be returned next morning to my guests with an explanation. It would be social ruin, he protested. I answered that he must take the consequences of his own deed. Then and there I burned the papers which he had won from me, and I replaced in a canvas bag which lay upon the table all the gold pieces. I would have left the room without another word, but he clung to me and tore the ruffle from my wrist in his attempt to hold me back and to prevail upon me to promise to say nothing to you or Sir Lothian Hume. It was his despairing cry when he found that I was proof against all his entreaties which reached your ears, Charles, and caused you to open your chamber door and to see me as I returned to my room."

My uncle drew a long breath of relief. "Nothing could be clearer!" he murmured.

“ In the morning I came, as you remember, to your room, and I returned your money. I did the same to Sir Lothian Hume. I said nothing of my reasons for doing so, for I found that I could not bring myself to confess our disgrace to you. Then came the horrible discovery which has darkened my life and which was as great a mystery to me as it has been to you. I saw that I was suspected, and I saw also that even if I were to clear myself it could only be done by a public confession of the infamy of my brother. I shrank from it, Charles. Any personal suffering seemed to me to be better than to bring public shame upon a family which has held an untarnished record through so many centuries. I fled from my trial, therefore, and disappeared from the world.

“ But, first of all, it was necessary that I should make arrangements for the wife and son, of whose existence you and my other friends were ignorant.—It is with shame, Mary, that I confess it, and I acknowledge to you that the blame of all the consequences rests with me rather than with you.—At the time there were reasons, now happily long gone past, which made me determine that the son was better apart from the mother, whose absence at that age he would not miss. I would have taken you into my confidence, Charles, had it not been that your suspicions had wounded me deeply—for I did not at that time understand how strong the reasons were which had prejudiced you against me.

“On the evening after the tragedy I fled to London, and arranged that my wife should have a fitting allowance, on condition that she did not interfere with the child. I had, as you remember, had much to do with Harrison, the prize-fighter, and I had often had occasion to admire his simple and honest nature. I took my boy to him now, and I found him, as I expected, incredulous as to my guilt, and ready to assist me in any way. At his wife’s entreaty he had just retired from the ring, and was uncertain how he should employ himself. I was able to fit him up as a smith, on condition that he should ply his trade at the village of Friar’s Oak. My agreement was that James was to be brought up as their nephew, and that he should know nothing of his unhappy parents.

“You will ask me why I selected Friar’s Oak. It was because I had already chosen my place of concealment, and if I could not see my boy it was at least some consolation to know that he was near me. You are aware that this mansion is one of the oldest in England, but you are not aware that it has been built with a very special eye to concealment, that there are no less than two habitable secret chambers, and that the outer or thicker walls are tunnelled into passages. The existence of these rooms has always been a family secret, though it was one which I valued so little that it was only the chance of my seldom using the house which had prevented me from pointing them out to some friend. Now I found that a secure retreat was provided for me in my extremity. I stole down to my own mansion, entered it at night, and leaving all that was dear to me behind, I crept like a rat behind the wainscot to live out the remainder of my weary life in solitude and misery. In this worn face, Charles, and in this grizzled hair, you may read the diary of my most miserable existence.

“Once a week Harrison used to bring me up provisions, passing them through the pantry window which I left open for the purpose. Sometimes I would steal out at night and walk under the stars once more, with the cool breeze upon my forehead; but this I had at last to stop, for I was seen by the rustics, and rumours of a spirit at Cliffe Royal began to get about. One night two ghost hunters——”

“It was I, father,” cried Boy Jim; “I and my friend Rodney Stone.”

“I knew it was. Harrison told me so the same night. I was proud, James, to see that you had the spirit of the Barringtons and that I had an heir whose gallantry might redeem the family blot which I had striven so hard to cover over. Then came the day when your mother's kindness—her mistaken kindness—gave you the means of escaping to London."

"Ah, Edward!" cried his wife, "if you had seen our boy, like a caged eagle, beating against the bars, you would have helped to give him even so short a flight as this."

"I do not blame you, Mary. It is possible that I should. He went to London and he tried to open a career for himself by his own strength and courage. How many of our ancestors have done the same, save only that a sword hilt lay in their closed hands, but of them all I do not know that any have carried themselves more gallantly!"

"That I dare swear," said my uncle heartily.

"And then when Harrison at last returned I learned that my son was actually matched to fight in a public prize battle. That would not do, Charles! It was one thing to fight as you and I have fought in our youth, and it was another to compete for a purse of gold."

"My dear friend, I would not for the world——"

"Of course you would not, Charles. You chose the best man, and how could you do otherwise? But it would not do! I determined that the time had come when I should reveal myself to my son, the more so as there were many signs that my most unnatural existence had seriously weakened my health. Chance, or shall I not rather say Providence, had at last made clear all that had been dark, and given me the means of establishing my innocence. My wife went yesterday to bring my boy at last to the side of his unfortunate father."

There was silence for some time, and then it was my uncle's voice which broke it.

"You've been the most ill-used man in the world, Ned," said he. "Please God, we shall have many years yet in which to make up to you for it. But after all it seems to me that we are as far as ever from learning how your unfortunate brother met his death."

"For eighteen years it was as much a mystery to me as to you, Charles. But now at last the guilt is manifest.—Stand forward, Ambrose, and tell your story as frankly and as fully as you have told it to me."

CHAPTER XXI.

THE VALET'S STORY.

THE valet had shrunk into the dark corner of the room and had remained so motionless that we had forgotten his presence until upon this appeal from his former master he took a step forward into the light, turning his sallow face in our direction. His usually impassive features were in a state of painful agitation, and he spoke slowly and with hesitation, as though his trembling lips could hardly frame the words. And yet so strong is habit that even in this extremity of emotion he assumed the deferential air of the high-class valet, and his sentences formed themselves in the sonorous fashion which had struck my attention upon that first day when the curricule of my uncle had stopped outside my father's door.

"My Lady Avon and gentlemen," said he, "if I have sinned in this matter, and I freely confess that I have done so, I only know one way in which I can atone for it, and that is by making the full and complete confession which my noble master, Lord Avon, has demanded. I assure you, then, that what I am about to tell you, surprising as it may seem, is the absolute and undeniable truth concerning the mysterious death of Captain Barrington.

“It may seem impossible to you that one in my humble walk of life should bear a deadly and implacable hatred against a man in the position of Captain Barrington. You think that the gulf between is too wide. I can tell you, gentlemen, that the gulf which can be bridged by unlawful love can be spanned also by an unlawful hatred, and that upon the day when this young man stole from me all that made my life worth living I vowed to Heaven that I should take from him that foul life of his, though the deed would cover but the tiniest fraction of the debt which he owed me. I see that you look askance at me, Sir Charles Tregellis, but you should pray to God, sir, that you may never have the chance of finding out what you would yourself be capable of in the same position!”

It was a wonder to all of us to see this man's fiery nature breaking suddenly through the artificial constraints with which he held it in check. His short, dark hair seemed to bristle upward, his eyes glowed with the intensity of his passion, and his face expressed a malignity of hatred which neither the death of his enemy nor the lapse of years could mitigate. The demure servant was gone, and there stood in his place a deep and dangerous man—one who might be an ardent lover or a most vindictive foe.

“We were about to be married, she and I, when some black chance threw him across our path. I do not know by what base deceptions he lured her away from me. I have heard that she was only one of many and that he was an adept at the art. It was done before ever I knew the danger, and she was left with her broken heart and her ruined life to return to that home into which she had brought disgrace and misery. I only saw her once. She told me that her seducer had burst out a laughing when she had reproached him for his perfidy, and I swore to her that his heart's blood would pay me for that laugh!

“I was a valet at the time, but I was not yet in the service of Lord Avon. I applied for and gained that position with the one idea that it might give me an opportunity of settling my accounts with his younger brother. And yet my chance was a terribly long time coming, for many months had passed before the visit to Cliffe

Royal gave me the opportunity which I longed for by day and dreamed of by night. When it did come, however, it came in a fashion which was more favourable to my plans than anything that I had ever ventured to hope for.

“Lord Avon was of opinion that no one but himself knew of the secret passages in Cliffe Royal. In this he was mistaken. I knew of them—or at least I knew enough of them to serve my purpose. I need not tell you how one day, when preparing the chambers for the guests, an accidental pressure upon part of the fittings caused a panel to gape in the woodwork and showed me a narrow opening in the wall. Making my way down this, I found that another panel led into a larger bedroom beyond. That was all I knew, but it was all that was needed for my purpose. The disposal of the rooms had been left in my hands, and I had arranged that Captain Barrington should sleep in the larger, and I in the smaller. I could come upon him when I wished, and no one would be the wiser.

“And then he arrived. How can I describe to you the fever of impatience in which I lived until the moment should come for which I had waited and planned? For a night and day they gambled, and for a night and a day I counted the minutes which brought me nearer to my man.

They might ring for fresh wine at what hour they liked, they always found me waiting and ready, so that this young captain hiccoughed out that I was the model of all valets. My master advised me to go to bed. He had noticed my flushed cheek and my bright eyes, and he set me down as being in a fever. So I was, but it was a fever which only one medicine could assuage.

“Then at last, very early in the morning, I heard them push back their chairs, and I knew that their game had at last come to an end. When I entered the room to receive my orders, I found that Captain Barrington had already stumbled off to bed. The others had also retired and my master was sitting alone at the table with his empty bottle and the scattered cards in front of him. He ordered me angrily to my room, and this time I obeyed him.

“My first care was to provide myself with a weapon. I knew that if I were face to face with him I could tear his throat out, but I must so arrange that the fashion of his death should be a noiseless one. There was a hunting trophy in the hall, and from it I took a straight, heavy knife which I sharpened upon my boot. Then I stole to my room and sat waiting upon the side of my bed. I had made up my mind what I should do. There would be little satisfaction in killing him if he was not to know whose hand had struck the blow or which of his sins it came to avenge. Could I but bind him and gag him in his drunken sleep, then a prick or two of my dagger would arouse him to listen to what I had to say to him. I pictured the look in his eyes as the haze of sleep cleared slowly away from them, the look of anger turning suddenly to stark horror as he understood who I was and what I had come for. It would be the supreme moment of my life.

“I waited, as it seemed to me, for at least an hour, but I had no watch, and my impatience was such that I dare say it really was little more than a quarter of that time. Then I rose, removed my shoes, took my knife, and having opened the panel slipped silently through. It was not more than thirty feet that I had to go, but I went inch by inch, for the old rotten boards snapped like breaking twigs if a sudden weight was placed upon them. It was, of course, pitch dark, and very, very slowly I felt my way along. At last I saw a yellow seam of light glimmering in front of me, and I knew that it came from the other panel. I was too soon then, since he had not yet extinguished his candles. I had waited many months, and I could afford to wait another hour, for I did not wish to do anything precipitately or in a hurry.

“It was very necessary to move silently now, since I was within a few feet of my man, with only the thin wooden partition between. Age had warped and cracked the boards, so that when I had at last very stealthily crept my way as far as the sliding panel I found that I could, without any difficulty, see into the room. Captain Barrington was standing by the dressing-table, with his coat and vest off. A large pile of sovereigns and several slips of paper were lying before him, and he was counting over his gambling gains. His face was flushed, and he was heavy from want of sleep and wine. It rejoiced me to see it, for it meant that his slumber would be deep, and that all would be made easy for me.

“I was still watching him, when of a sudden I saw him start and a terrible expression come upon his face. For an instant my heart stood still, for I feared that he had in some way divined my presence. And then I heard the voice of my master within. I could not see the door by which he had entered, nor could I see him where he stood, but I heard all that he had to say. As I watched the captain's face flush fiery red and then turn to a livid white as he listened to those bitter words which told him of his infamy, my revenge was sweeter—far sweeter—than my most pleasant dreams had ever pictured it. I saw my master approach the dressing-table, hold the papers in the flame of the candle, throw their charred ashes into the grate, and sweep the golden pieces into a small brown canvas bag. Then as he turned to leave the room the captain seized him by the wrist, imploring him by the memory of their mother to have mercy upon him, and I loved my master as I saw him drag his sleeve from the grasp of the clutching fingers and leave the stricken wretch grovelling upon the floor.

“And now I was left with a difficult point to settle, for it was hard for me to say whether it was better that I should do that which I had come for, or whether by holding this man’s guilty secret I might not have in my hand a keener and more deadly weapon than my master’s hunting knife. I was sure that Lord Avon could not and would not expose him. I knew your sense of family pride too well, my lord, and I was certain that his secret was safe in your hands. But I both could and would, and then when his life had been blasted and he had been hounded from his regiment and from his clubs, it would be time, perhaps, for me to deal in some other way with him."

"Ambrose, you are a black villain!" said my uncle.

"We all have our own feelings, Sir Charles, and you will permit me to say that a serving man may resent an injury as much as a gentleman, though the redress of the duel is denied to him. But I am telling you frankly, at Lord Avon's request, all that I thought and did upon that night, and I shall continue to do so, even if I am not fortunate enough to win your approval.

"When Lord Avon had left him the captain remained for some time in a kneeling attitude with his face sunk upon a chair. Then he rose and paced slowly up and down the room, his chin sunk upon his breast. Every now and then he would pluck at his hair, or shake his clinched hands in the air, and I saw the moisture glisten upon his brow. For a time I lost sight of him, and I heard him opening drawer after drawer, as though he were in search of something. Then he stood over by his dressing-table again, with his back turned to me. His head was thrown a little back, and he had both hands up to the collar of his shirt as though he were striving to undo it.

“And then there was a sound as if a ewer had been upset, and down he sank upon the ground, with his head in the corner, twisted round at so strange an angle to his shoulders that one glimpse of it told me that my man was slipping swiftly from the clutch in which I fancied that I held him. I slid my panel and was in the room in an instant. His eyelids still quivered, and it seemed to me as my gaze met his glazing eyes that I could read both recognition and surprise in them. I laid my knife upon the floor, and I stretched myself out beside him that I might whisper in his ear one or two little things of which I wished to remind him, but even as I did so he gave a gasp and was gone.

“It is singular that I, who had never feared him in life, should be frightened at him now, and yet when I looked at him and saw that all was motionless, save the creeping stain upon the carpet, I was seized with a sudden foolish spasm of terror, and, catching up my knife, I fled swiftly and silently back to my own room, closing the panels behind me. It was only when I had reached it that I found that in my mad haste I had carried away not the hunting knife which I had taken with me, but the bloody razor which had dropped from the dead man's hand. This I concealed where no one has ever discovered it, but my fears would not allow me to go back for the other, as I might perhaps have done had I foreseen how terribly its presence might tell against my master. And that, Lady Avon and gentlemen, is an exact and honest account of how Captain Barrington came by his end."

"And how was it," asked my uncle, angrily, "that you have allowed an innocent man to be persecuted all these years when a word from you might have saved him?"

"Because I had every reason to believe, Sir Charles, that that would be most unwelcome to Lord Avon. How could I tell all this without revealing the family scandal which he was so anxious to conceal? I confess that at the beginning I did not tell him what I had seen, and my excuse must be that he disappeared before I had time to determine what I should do. For many a year, however—ever since I have been in your service, Sir Charles—my conscience tormented me, and I swore that if ever I should find my old master I should reveal everything to him. The chance of my overhearing a story told by young Mister Stone here, which showed me that some one was using the secret chambers of Cliffe Royal, convinced me that Lord Avon was in hiding there, and I lost no time in seeking him out and offering to do him all the justice in my power."

"What he says is true," said his master, "but it would have been strange indeed if I had hesitated to sacrifice a frail life and failing health in a cause for which I freely surrendered all that youth had to offer. But new considerations have at last compelled me to alter my resolution. My son, through ignorance of his true position, was drifting into a course of life which accorded with his strength and his spirit, but not with the traditions of his house. Again, I reflected that many of those who knew my brother had passed away, that all the facts need not come out, and that my death, while under the suspicion of such a crime, would cast a deeper stain upon our name than the sin which he had so terribly expiated. For these reasons——"

The tramp of several heavy footsteps reverberating through the old house broke in suddenly upon Lord Avon's words. His wan face turned even a shade grayer as he heard it, and he looked piteously to his wife and son.

"They will arrest me!" he cried. "I must submit to the degradation of an arrest!"

"This way, Sir James, this way!" said the harsh tones of Sir Lothian Hume from without.

"I do not need to be shown the way in a house where I have drunk many a bottle of good claret," cried a deep voice in reply, and there in the doorway stood the broad figure of Squire Ovington, in his buckskins and top boots, a riding crop in his hand. Sir Lothian Hume was at his elbow, and I saw the faces of two country constables peeping over his shoulder.

"Lord Avon," said the squire, "as a magistrate of the county of Sussex it is my duty to tell you that a warrant is held against you for the wilful murder of your brother, Captain Barrington, in the year 1786."

"I am ready to answer the charge."

"This I tell you as a magistrate. But as a man, and the squire of Rougham Grange, I'm right glad to see you, Ned, and here's my hand on it, and never will I believe that a good Tory like yourself, and a man who could show his horse's tail to any field in the whole Down country, would ever be capable of so vile an act."

"You do me justice, James," said Lord Avon, clasping the broad brown hand which the country squire had held out to him. "I am as innocent as you are, and I can prove it."

"Damned glad I am to hear it, Ned! That is to say, Lord Avon, that any defence which you may have to make will be decided upon by your peers and by the laws of your country."

"Until which time," added Sir Lothian Hume, "a stout door and a good lock will be the best guarantee that Lord Avon will be there when called for."

The squire's weather-stained face flushed to a deeper red as he turned upon the Londoner.

"Are you the magistrate of a county, sir?"

"I have not the honour, Sir James."

"Then how dare you advise a man who has sat on the bench for nigh twenty years? When I am in doubt, sir, the law provides me with a clerk, with whom I may confer, and I ask no other assistance."

"You take too high a tone in this matter, Sir James. I am not accustomed to be taken to task so sharply."

"Nor am I accustomed, sir, to be interfered with in my official duties. I speak as a magistrate, Sir Lothian, but I am always very ready to sustain my opinions as a man."

Sir Lothian bowed.

"You will allow me to observe, sir, that I have personal interests of the highest importance involved in this matter. I have every reason to believe that there is a conspiracy afoot which will affect my position as heir to Lord Avon's titles and estates. I desire his safe custody in order that this matter may be cleared up, and I call upon you, as a magistrate, to execute your warrant."

"Plague take it, Ned!" cried the squire, "I would that my clerk Johnson were here, for I would deal as kindly by you as the law allows, and yet I am, as you hear, called upon to secure your person."

"Permit me to suggest, sir," said my uncle, "that so long as he is under the personal supervision of the magistrate he may be said to be under the care of the law, and that this condition will be fulfilled if he is under the roof of Rougham Grange."

"Nothing could be better," cried the squire, heartily.—"You will stay with me, Ned, until this matter blows over. In other words, Lord Avon, I make myself responsible as the representative of the law that you are held in safe custody until your person may be required of me."

"Yours is a true heart, James."

“Tut, tut! it is the due process of the law.—I trust, Sir Lothian Hume, that you find nothing to object to in it.”

Sir Lothian shrugged his shoulders and looked blackly at the magistrate. Then he turned to my uncle.

“There is a small matter still open between us,” said he. “Would you kindly give me the name of a friend? Mr. Corcoran, who is outside in my barouche, would act for me, and we might meet to-morrow morning.”

“With pleasure,” answered my uncle.—“I dare say your father would act for me, nephew.—Your friend may call upon Lieutenant Stone, of Friar’s Oak, and the sooner the better.”

And so this strange conference ended. As for me, I had sprung to the side of the old friend of my boyhood, and was trying to tell him my joy at his good fortune, and listening to his assurance that nothing that could ever befall him could weaken the love that he bore me. My uncle touched me on the shoulder, and we were about to leave, when Ambrose, whose bronze mask had been drawn down once more over his fiery passions, came demurely toward him.

“Beg your pardon, Sir Charles,” said he, “but it shocks me very much to see your cravat.”

“You are right, Ambrose,” my uncle answered. "Lorimer does his best, but I have never been able to fill your place."

"Lord Avon has the prior claim. If he will release me——"

"You may go, Ambrose, you may go!" cried Lord Avon. "You are an excellent servant, but your presence has become painful to me."

"Thank you, Ned," said my uncle. "C'est le meilleur valet possible. But you must not leave me so suddenly again."

"Permit me to explain the reason, sir. I had determined to give you notice when we reached Brighton, but as we drove from the village that day I caught a glimpse of a lady passing in a phaeton, between whom and Lord Avon I was well aware that there was a close intimacy, although I was not certain that she was actually his wife. Her presence there confirmed me in my opinion that he was in hiding at Cliffe Royal, and I dropped from your curricule and followed her at once in order to lay the matter before her, and explain how very necessary it was that Lord Avon should see me."

"Well, I forgive you for your desertion, Ambrose," said my uncle. "And," he added, "I should be vastly obliged to you if you would re-arrange my tie."

CHAPTER XXII.

THE END.

SIR JAMES OVINGTON'S carriage was waiting without, and in it the Avon family, so tragically separated and so strangely reunited, were borne away to the squire's hospitable home. When they had gone, my uncle mounted his curricule and drove Ambrose and myself to the village.

"We had best see your father at once, nephew," said he. "Sir Lothian and his man started some time ago. I should be sorry if there were any hitch in our meeting."

For my part I was thinking of our opponent's deadly reputation as a duellist, and I suppose that my features must have betrayed my feelings, for my uncle began to laugh.

"Why, nephew," said he, "you look as if you were walking behind my coffin! It is not my first affair, and I dare bet that it will not be my last. When I fight near town I usually fire a hundred or so in Manton's back shop, but I dare say I can find my way to his waistcoat. But I confess that I am somewhat accablé by all that has befallen us. To think of my dear old friend being not only alive, but innocent as well! And that he should have such a strapping son and heir to carry on the race of Avon! This will be the last blow to Hume, for I know that the Jews have given him rope on the score of his expectations.—And you, Ambrose, that you should break out in such a way!”

Of all the amazing things which had happened this seemed to have impressed my uncle most, and he recurred to it again and again. That a man whom he had come to regard as a machine for tying cravats and brewing chocolate should suddenly develop fiery human passions was indeed a prodigy. If his silver razor-heater had taken to evil ways he could not have been more astounded.

We were still a hundred yards from the cottage, when I saw the tall, green-coated Mr. Corcoran striding down the garden path. My father was waiting for us at the door, with an expression of subdued delight upon his face.

“Happy to serve you in any way, Sir Charles,” said he. “We’ve arranged it for tomorrow at seven on Ditchling Common.”

“I wish these things could be brought off a little later in the day," said my uncle. "One has either to rise at a perfectly absurd hour, or else to neglect one's toilet.

"They are stopping across the road at the Friar's Oak Inn, and if you would wish it later——"

"No, no, I shall make the effort.—Ambrose, you will bring up the batterie de toilette at five."

"I don't know whether you would care to use my barkers," said my father. "I've had 'em in fourteen actions, and up to thirty yards you wouldn't wish a better tool."

"Thank you, I have my duelling pistols under the seat.—See that the triggers are oiled, Ambrose, for I love a light pull.—Ah, sister Mary, I have brought your boy back to you—none the worse, I trust, for the dissipations of town."

I need not tell you how my dear mother wept over me and fondled me, for you who have mothers will know for yourselves, and you who have not will never understand how warm and snug the home nest can be. How I had chafed and longed for the wonders of town, and yet, now that I had seen more than my wildest dreams had ever deemed possible, my eyes had rested upon nothing which was so sweet and so restful as our own little sitting room with its terra-cotta-coloured wall, and those trifles which are so insignificant in themselves and yet so rich in memories, the blow fish from Moluccas, the narwhal's horn from the arctic, and the picture of the Ça Ira with Lord Hotham in chase! How cheery, too, to see at one side of the shining grate my father with his pipe and his merry red face, and on the other my mother with her fingers ever turning and darting with her knitting needles! As I looked at them I marvelled that I could ever have longed to leave them, or that I could bring myself to leave them again.

But leave them I must, and that speedily, as I learned amid the boisterous congratulations of my father and the tears of my mother. He had himself been appointed to the Cato sixty-four, with post rank, while a note had come from Lord Nelson at Portsmouth to say that a vacancy was open for me if I should present myself at once.

“And your mother has your sea-chest all ready, my lad, and you can travel down with me to-morrow, for if you are to be one of Nelson's men you must show him that you are worthy of it.”

“All the Stones have been in the sea service,” said my mother, apologetically to my uncle, “and it is a great chance that he should enter under Lord Nelson's own patronage. But we can never forget your kindness, Charles, in showing our dear Rodney something of the world."

"On the contrary, sister Mary," said my uncle graciously, "your son has been an excellent companion to me—so much so that I fear that I am open to the charge of having neglected my dear Fidelio. I trust that I bring him back somewhat more polished than I found him. It would be folly to call him distingué, but he is at least unobjectionable. Nature has denied him the highest gifts, and I find him adverse to employing the compensating advantages of art, but at least I have shown him something of life, and I have taught him a few lessons in finesse and deportment, which may appear to be wasted upon him at present, but which none the less may come back to him in his more mature years. If his career in town has been a disappointment to me the reason lies mainly in the fact that I am foolish enough to measure others by the standard which I have myself set. I am well disposed toward him, however, and I consider him eminently adapted for the profession which he is about to adopt."

He held out his sacred snuffbox to me as he spoke, as a solemn pledge of his good will, and, as I look back at him, there is no moment at which I see him more plainly than that, with the old mischievous light dancing once more in his large, intolerant eyes, one thumb in the armpit of his vest and the little shining box held out upon his snow-white palm. He was a type and leader of a strange breed of men which has vanished away from England, the full-blooded, virile buck, exquisite in his dress, narrow in his thoughts, coarse in his amusements, and eccentric in his habits. They walk across the bright stage of English history with their finicky step, their preposterous cravats, their high collars, their dangling seals, and they vanish into those dark wings from which there is no return. The world has outgrown them, and there is no place now for their strange fashions, their practical jokes and carefully cultivated eccentricities. And yet behind this outer veiling of folly with which they so carefully draped themselves they were often men of strong character and robust personality.

The languid loungers of St. James's were also the yachtsmen of the Solent, the fine riders of the shires, and the hardy fighters in many a wayside battle and many a morning frolic. Wellington picked his best officers from among them. They condescended occasionally to poetry or oratory, and Byron, Charles James Fox, Sheridan, and Castlereagh preserved some reputation among them in spite of their publicity. I can not think how the historian of the future can hope to understand them when I who knew one of them so well, and bore his blood in my veins, could never quite tell how much of him was real and how much was due to the affectations which he had cultivated so long that they had ceased to deserve the name. Through the chinks of that armour of folly I have sometimes thought that I had caught a glimpse of a good and true man within, and it pleases me to hope that I was right.

It was destined that the exciting incidents of that day were even now not at an end. I had retired early to rest, but it was impossible for me to sleep, for my mind would turn to Boy Jim, and to the extraordinary change in his position and prospects. I was still turning and tossing, when I heard the sound of flying hoofs coming down the London road, and immediately afterward the grating of wheels as they pulled up in front of the inn. My window chanced to be open, for it was a fresh spring night, and I heard the creak of the inn door, and a voice asking whether Sir Lothian Hume was within. At the name I sprang from my bed, and I was in time to see three men, who had alighted from the carriage, file into the lighted hall. The two horses were left standing, with the glare of the open door falling upon their brown shoulders and patient heads.

Ten minutes may have passed, and then I heard the clatter of many steps, and a knot of men came clustering through the door.

"You need not employ violence," said a harsh, clear voice. "On whose suit is it?"

"Several suits, sir. They 'eld over in the 'opes that you'd pull off the fight this mornin'. Total amounts is twelve thousand pounds."

"Look here, my man! I have a very important appointment for seven o'clock to-morrow. I'll give you fifty pounds if you will leave me until then."

"Couldn't do it, sir, really. It's more than our places as sheriff's officers is worth."

In the yellow glare of the carriage lamp I saw the baronet look up at our windows, and if hatred could have killed, his eye would have been as deadly as his pistol.

"I can't mount the carriage unless you free my hands," said he.

“’Old ’ard, Bill, for ’e looks wicious. Let go o’ one arm at a time! Ah, would you then!”

“Corcoran! Corcoran!” screamed a voice, and I saw a plunge, a struggle, and one frantic figure breaking its way from the rest. Then came a heavy blow, and down he fell in the middle of the moonlit road flapping and jumping among the dust like a trout new landed.

“He’s napped it this time! Get ’im by the wrists, Jim! Now, all together!” He was hoisted up like a bag of flour and fell with a brutal thud into the bottom of the carriage. The three men sprang in after him, a whip whistled in the darkness, and I had seen the last that I or any one else, save some charitable visitor to a debtor’s jail, was ever again destined to see of Sir Lothian Hume, the once fashionable Corinthian.

Lord Avon lived for two years longer—long enough, with the help of Ambrose, to fully establish his innocence of the horrible crime in the shadow of which he had lived so long. What he could not clear away, however, was the effect of those years of morbid and unnatural life spent in the hidden chambers of the old house, and it was only the devotion of his wife and of his son which kept the thin and flickering flame of his life so long alight. She whom I had known as the play actress of Anstey Cross became the dowager Lady

Avon, while Boy Jim, as dear to me now as when we harried birds' nests and tickled trout together, is now Lord Avon, beloved by his tenantry, the finest sportsman and the most popular man from the north of The Weald to the Channel. He was married to the second daughter of Sir James Ovington, and as I have seen three of his grandchildren within the week, I fancy that if any of Sir Lothian's descendants have their eye upon the property they are likely to be as disappointed as their ancestor was before them.

The old house of Cliffe Royal has been pulled down, owing to the terrible family associations which hung round it, and a beautiful modern building sprang up in its place. The lodge which stood by the Brighton road was so dainty with its trellis work and its rosebushes that I was not the only visitor who declared that I had rather be the owner of it than of the great house among the trees. There, for many years, in a happy and peaceful old age, lived Jack Harrison and his wife, receiving back in the sunset of their lives the loving care which they had themselves bestowed. Never again did champion Harrison throw his leg over the ropes of a twenty-four-foot ring, but the story of the great battle between the smith and the west countryman is still familiar to old ring-goers; and nothing pleased him better than to refight it all, round by round, as he sat in the sunshine under his rose-girt porch. But, if he heard the tap of his wife's stick approaching him, his talk would break off at once into the garden and its prospects, for she was still haunted by the fear that he would some day go back to the ring, and she never missed the old man for an hour without being convinced that he had hobbled off to wrest the belt from the latest upstart champion. It was at his own very earnest request that they inscribed "He fought the good fight" upon his tombstone, and though I can not doubt that he had Black Baruk and Crab Wilson in his mind when he asked it, yet none who knew him would grudge its spiritual meaning as a summing up of his clean and manly life.

Sir Charles Tregellis continued for some years to show his scarlet and gold at Newmarket and his inimitable coats in St. James's. It was he who invented buttons and loops at the ends of dress pantaloons, and who broke fresh ground by his investigation of the comparative merits of isinglass and of starch in the preparation of shirt fronts. There are old fops still lurking in the corners of Arthur's or of White's who can remember Tregellis's dictum that a cravat should be so stiffened that three parts of the length should be raised by one corner, and the painful schism which followed when Lord Alvanley and his school contended that a half was sufficient.

Then came the supremacy of Brummel and the open breach upon the subject of velvet collars in which the town followed the lead of the younger man. My uncle, who was not born to be second to any one, retired instantly to St. Albans, and announced that he would make it the centre of fashion and of society instead of degenerate London. It chanced, however, that the mayor and corporation waited upon him with an address of thanks for his good intentions toward the town, and that the burgesses, having ordered new coats from London for the occasion, were all arrayed in velvet collars, which so preyed upon my uncle's spirits that he took to his bed, and never showed his face in public again. His money, which had ruined what might have been a great life, was divided among many bequests, an annuity to his valet, Ambrose, being among them, but enough has come to his sister, my dear mother, to help to make her old age as sunny and as pleasant as even I could wish.

And as for me—the poor string upon which these beads are strung—I dare scarce say another word about myself lest this which I had meant to be the last word of a chapter should grow into the first words of a new one. Had I not taken up my pen to tell you a story of the land I might perchance have made a better one of the sea, but the one frame can not hold two opposite pictures. The day may come when I shall write down all that I remember of the greatest battle ever fought upon salt water, and how my father's gallant life was brought to an end as with his paint rubbing against a French eighty-gun ship on one side and a Spanish seventy-four upon the other, he stood eating an apple in the break of his poop. I saw the smoke banks on that October evening swirl slowly up over the Atlantic swell and rise and rise until they had shredded into thinnest air and lost themselves in the infinite blue of heaven. And with them rose the cloud which had hung over our country, and it also thinned and thinned until God's own sun of peace and security was shining once more upon us, never more we hope to be be-dimmed.

RUDYARD KIPLING.

RUDYARD KIPLING'S NEW BOOK.

THE SEVEN SEAS.

A new volume of poems by RUDYARD KIPLING, author of "Many Inventions," "Bar-racket-Room Ballads," etc.
12mo, cloth, special binding,
$1.50.

The appearance of a new volume by Mr. Kipling has come to be regarded as a literary event. This new book is one of special importance, in that it represents in an admirable and conclusive manner not only the verse of the soldier's life, but also poetry of adventure and of the sea, and of a modern field, to be termed roughly the romance of applied science, which Mr. Kipling has made his own. His work as the poet of the British Army, introducing, as it did, a new strain into the metrical outpourings of our time, has made an impression throughout the English-speaking world which will be deepened by the verse to come in this new book. His latest field finds an apt illustration in that strenuous and remarkable achievement, "McAndrew's Hymn." Here the realist and romanticist unite. To the old Scotch engineer, an unconscious pantheist, each part of his engine is not only alive but also a personification of the Supreme Power which he recognizes over all. The steamship engine, or the locomotive engine, or any other high expression of matter animated by mind, is a theme for modern poetry, so imposing, so suggestive, and so direct that it is only strange the poets have given so little thought to the significance and power of the most characteristic products of their age.

Our own time has furnished no better proofs of the poet's illuminating and quickening power than Mr. Kipling's splendid interpretation of colonial patriotism in "The Native Born," his apotheosis of the sea power in poems like "The Flag of England," "The Bolivar," and "The Camperdown," and the imperial patriotism of his "Song of the English." Elsewhere we have the sonorous roll of "The Last Chantey," and the tinkle of the "Song of the Banjo." The public have been prompt to feel the grasp and swing of Mr. Kipling's verse. He offers no venerated imitations of old French forms of love poetry, nor does he laboriously hammer agnostic prose speculations into the form of verse. What he says is alive. His utterances are vivid and spontaneous, and many a jaded reader has put up a thanksgiving for his fire and force. In this new book of verses the qualities which have distinguished the author are shown in a riper and fuller development than ever before, and for this reason, and also on account of his range of themes, it seems proper to invite special attention to the coming volume.

STEPHEN CRANE'S BOOKS.

THE LITTLE REGIMENT, and Other Episodes of the American Civil War. 12mo. Cloth, $1.00.

In these studies of the theme which he treated with such power in "The Red Badge of Courage" Mr. Crane shows a gain in strength and in command of his material which indicates for the companion volume of "The Red Badge" an equal if not a greater success. This book completes the story of "The Red Badge's" hero.

MAGGIE: A GIRL OF THE STREETS.
12mo. Cloth, 75 cents.

"By writing 'Maggie' Mr. Crane has made for himself a permanent place in literature. . . . Zola himself scarcely has surpassed its tremendous portrayal of throbbing, breathing, moving life."—New York Mail and Express.

"Mr. Crane's story should be read for the fidelity with which it portrays a life that is potent on this island, along with the best of us. It is a powerful portrayal, and, if somber and repellent, none the less true, none the less freighted with appeal to those who are able to assist in righting wrongs."—New York Times.

"The story is full of clever descriptions. . . . Written in short, terse sentences which compel the imagination rather than stimulate it. . . . 'Maggie' is unmistakably the work of the author of 'The Red Badge of Courage.'"—Boston Herald.

THE RED BADGE OF COURAGE. An Episode of the American Civil War. 12mo. Cloth, $1.00.

"Never before have we had the seamy side of glorious war so well depicted. . . . The action of the story throughout is splendid, and all aglow with color, movement, and vim. The style is as keen and bright as a sword-blade, and a Kipling has done nothing better in this line."—Chicago Evening Post.

"We have had many stories of the war; this stands absolutely alone."—Boston Transcript.

"There is nothing in American fiction to compare with it. . . . Mr. Crane has added to American literature something that has never been done before, and that is, in its own peculiar way, inimitable."—Boston Beacon.

"Holds one irrevocably. There is no possibility of resistance when once you are in its grasp."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A truer and completer picture of the war than either Tolstoy or Zola."—London New Review.

"A remarkable study of the average mind under stress of battle. . . . A really fine achievement."—London Daily Chronicle.

"Not merely a remarkable book; it is a revelation."—St. James's Gazette.

THE STATEMENT OF STELLA MABERLY.

By F. ANSTEY, author of "Vice Versa," "The Giant's Robe," etc. 16mo. Cloth, special binding, $1.25.

"Most admirably done. . . . We read fascinated, and fully believing every word we read. . . . The book has deeply interested us, and even thrilled us more than once."—London Daily Chronicle.

"A wildly fantastic story, thrilling and impressive. . . . Has an air of vivid reality, . . . of bold conception and vigorous treatment. . . . A very noteworthy novelette."—London Times.

MMARCH HARES. By HAROLD FREDERIC, author of "The Damnation of Theron Ware," "In the Valley," etc.

16mo. Cloth, special binding, $1.25.

"One of the most cheerful novels we have chanced upon for many a day. It has much of the rapidity and vigor of a smartly written farce, with a pervading freshness a smartly written farce rarely possesses. . . . A book decidedly worth reading."—London Saturday Review.

"A striking and original story, . . . effective, pleasing, and very capable."—London Literary World.

GREEN GATES. An Analysis of Foolishness. By

Mrs. K. M. C. MEREDITH (Johanna Staats), author of "Drumsticks," etc. 16mo. Cloth, $1.25.

"Crisp and delightful. . . . Fascinating, not so much for what it suggests as for its manner, and the cleverly outlined people who walk through its pages."—Chicago Times-Herald.

"An original strain, bright and vivacious, and strong enough in its foolishness and its unexpected tragedy to prove its sterling worth."—Boston Herald.

AN IMAGINATIVE MAN. By ROBERT S. HICHENS, author of "The Folly of Eustace," "The Green Carnation," etc. 12mo. Cloth, $1.25.

"A study in character. . . . Just as entertaining as though it were the conventional story of love and marriage. The clever hand of the author of 'The Green Carnation' is easily detected in the caustic wit and pointed epigram."—Jeannette L. Gilder, in the New York World.

CORRUPTION. By PERCY WHITE, author of "Mr.

Bailey-Martin," etc. 12mo. Cloth, $1.25.

"A drama of biting intensity. A tragedy of inflexible purpose and relentless result."—Pall Mall Gazette.

AHARD WOMAN. A Story in Scenes. By VIOLET HUNT. 12mo. Cloth, $1.25.

"A good story, bright, keen, and dramatic. . . . It is out of the ordinary, and will give you a new sensation."—New-York Herald.

GILBERT PARKER'S BEST BOOKS.

THE SEATS OF THE MIGHTY. Being the Memoirs of Captain ROBERT MORAY, sometime an Officer in the Virginia Regiment, and afterwards of Amherst's Regiment. 12mo. Cloth, illustrated, $1.50.

"Another historical romance of the vividness and intensity of 'The Seats of the Mighty' has never come from the pen of an American. Mr. Parker's latest work may, without hesitation, be set down as the best he has done. From the first chapter to the last word interest in the book never wanes; one finds it difficult to interrupt the narrative with breathing space. It whirls with excitement and strange adventure. . . . All of the scenes do homage to the genius of Mr. Parker, and make 'The Seats of the Mighty' one of the books of the year."—Chicago Record.

"Mr. Gilbert Parker is to be congratulated on the excellence of his latest story. 'The Seats of the Mighty,' and his readers are to be congratulated on the direction which his talents have taken therein. . . . It is so good that we do not stop to think of its literature, and the personality of Doltaire is a masterpiece of creative art."—New York Mail and Express.

THE TRAIL OF THE SWORD. A Novel. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"Mr. Parker here adds to a reputation already wide, and anew demonstrates his power of pictorial portrayal and of strong dramatic situation and climax."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

"The tale holds the reader's interest from first to last, for it is full of fire and spirit, abounding in incident, and marked by good character drawing."—Pittsburg Times.

THE TRESPASSER. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"Interest, pith, force, and charm—Mr. Parker's new story possesses all these qualities. . . . Almost bare of synthetical decoration, his paragraphs are stirring because they are real. We read at times—as we have read the great masters of romance—breathlessly."—The Critic.

"Gilbert Parker writes a strong novel, but thus far this is his masterpiece. . . . It is one of the great novels of the year."—Boston Advertiser.

THE TRANSLATION OF A SAVAGE. 16mo. Flexible cloth, 75 cents.

"A book which no one will be satisfied to put down until the end has been matter of certainty and assurance."—The Nation.

"A story of remarkable interest, originality, and ingenuity of construction."—Boston Home Journal.

"The perusal of this romance will repay those who care for new and original types of character, and who are susceptible to the fascination of a fresh and vigorous style."—London Daily News.

THE REDS OF THE MIDI. An Episode of the French Revolution. By FÉLIX GRAS. Translated from the Provençal by Mrs. CATHARINE A. JANVIER. With an Introduction by THOMAS A. JANVIER. With Frontispiece. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"It is doubtful whether in the English language we have had a more powerful, impressive, artistic picture of the French Revolution, from the revolutionist's point of view, than that presented in Félix Gras's 'The Reds of the Midi.' . . . Adventures follow one another rapidly; splendid, brilliant pictures are frequent, and the thread of a tender, beautiful love story winds in and out of its pages."—New York Mail and Express.

"'The Reds of the Midi' is a red rose from the Provence, a breath of pure air in the stifling atmosphere of present-day romance—a stirring narrative of one of the most picturesque events of the Revolution. It is told with all the strength of simplicity and directness; it is warm and pulsating, and fairly trembles with excitement."—Chicago Record.

"To the names of Dickens, Hugo, and Erckmann-Chatrion must be added that of Félix Gras, as a romancer who has written a tale of the French Revolution not only possessing historical interest, but charming as a story. A delightful piece of literature, of a rare and exquisite flavor."—Buffalo Express.

"No more forcible presentation of the wrongs which the poorer classes suffered in France at the end of the eighteenth century has ever been put between the covers of a book."—Boston Budget.

"Every page is alive with incidents or scenes of the time, and any one who reads it will get a vivid picture that can never be forgotten of the Reign of Terror in Paris."—San Francisco Chronicle.

THE GODS, SOME MORTALS, AND LORD WICKENHAM. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS. With Portrait. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"Mrs. Craigie has taken her place among the novelists of the day. It is a high place and a place apart. Her method is her own, and she stands not exactly on the threshold of a great career, but already within the temple of fame."—G. W. Smalley, in the Tribune.

"Here is the sweetness of a live love story. . . . It is to be reckoned among the brilliants as a novel."—Boston Courier.

"One of the most refreshing novels of the period, full of grace, spirit, force, feeling, and literary charm."—Chicago Evening Post.

"Clever and cynical, full of epigrams and wit, bright with keen delineations of character, and with a shrewd insight into life."—Newark Advertiser.

"A novel of profound psychological knowledge and ethical import. . . . Worthy of high rank in current fiction."—Boston Beacon.

New York: D. APPLETON & CO., 72 Fifth Avenue.

YEKL. A Tale of the New York Ghetto. By A. CAHAN.
Uniform with "The Red Badge of Courage." 12mo. Cloth, $1.00.

"A new and striking tale; the charm, the verity, the literary quality of the book depend upon its study of character, its 'local color,' its revelation to Americans of a social state at their very doors of which they have known nothing."—New York Times.

"The story is a revelation to us. It is written in a spirited, breezy way, with an originality in the telling of which is quite unexpected. The dialect is striking in its truth to Nature."—Boston Courier.

"Is in all probability the only true picture we have yet had of that most densely populated spot on the face of the earth—the ghetto of the metropolis, rather the metropolis of the ghettos of the world."—New York Journal.

"A series of vivid pictures of a strange people. . . . The people and their social life the author depicts with marvelous success."—Boston Transcript.

"The reader will become deeply interested in Mr. Cahan's graphic presentation of ghetto life in New York."—Minneapolis Journal.

"A strong, quaint story."—Detroit Tribune.

"Every feature of the book bears the stamp of truth. . . . Undoubtedly 'Yekl' has never been excelled as a picture of the distinctive life of the New York ghetto."—Boston Herald.

THE SENTIMENTAL SEX. By GERTRUDE WAR-
DEN. 12mo. Cloth, $1.00.

"The cleverest book by a woman that has been published for months. . . . Such books as 'The Sentimental Sex' are exemplars of a modern cult that will not be ignored."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

"There is a well-wrought mystery in the story and some surprises that preserve the reader's interest, and render it, when all is said, a story of considerable charm."—Boston Courier.

"An uncommonly knowing little book, which keeps a good grip on the reader up to the last page. . . . The author's method of handling the plot is adroit and original."—Rochester Herald.

"Miss Warden has worked out her contrasts very strikingly, and tells her story in a cleverly flippant way, which keeps the reader on the qui vive for the cynical but bright sayings she has interspersed."—Detroit Free Press.

"The story forms an admirable study. The style is graphic, the plot original and cleverly wrought out."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

BY S. R. CROCKETT.

CLEGG KELLY, ARAB OF THE CITY. His Progress and Adventures. Uniform with "The Lilac Sunbonnet" and "Bog-Myrtle and Peat." Illustrated. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"A masterpiece which Mark Twain himself has never rivaled. . . . If there ever was an ideal character in fiction it is this heroic ragamuffin."—London Daily Chronicle.

BOG-MYRTLE AND PEAT. Third edition. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"Here are idyls, epics, dramas of human life, written in words that thrill and burn. . . . Each is a poem that has an immortal flavor. They are fragments of the author's early dreams, too bright, too gorgeous, too full of the blood of rubies and the life of diamonds to be caught and held palpitating in expression's grasp."—Boston Courier.

"Hardly a sketch among them all that will not afford pleasure to the reader for its genial humor, artistic local coloring, and admirable portrayal of character."—Boston Home Journal.

"One dips into the book anywhere and reads on and on, fascinated by the writer's charm of manner."—Minneapolis Tribune.

THE LILAC SUNBONNET. Sixth edition. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"A love story pure and simple, one of the old-fashioned, wholesome, sunshiny kind, with a pure-minded, sound-hearted hero, and a heroine who is merely a good and beautiful woman; and if any other love story half so sweet has been written this year, it has escaped our notice."—New York Times.

"The general conception of the story, the motive of which is the growth of love between the young chief and heroine, is delineated with a sweetness and a freshness, a naturalness and a certainty, which places 'The Lilac Sunbonnet' among the best stories of the time."—New York Mail and Express.

"In its own line this little love story can hardly be excelled. It is a pastoral, an idyl—the story of love and courtship and marriage of a fine young man and a lovely girl—no more. But it is told in so thoroughly delightful a manner, with such playful humor, such delicate fancy, such true and sympathetic feeling, that nothing more could be desired."—Boston Traveller.

MISS F. F. MONTRÉSOR'S BOOKS.

FALSE COIN OR TRUE? 12mo. Cloth, $1.25.

"One of the few true novels of the day. . . . It is powerful, and touched with a delicate insight and strong impressions of life and character. . . . The author's theme is original, her treatment artistic, and the book is remarkable for its unflagging interest."—Philadelphia Record.

"The tale never flags in interest, and once taken up will not be laid down until the last page is finished."—Boston Budget.

"A well-written novel, with well-depicted characters and well-chosen scenes."—Chicago News.

"A sweet, tender, pure, and lovely story."—Buffalo Commercial.

THE ONE WHO LOOKED ON. 12mo. Cloth,
$1.25.

"A tale quite unusual, entirely unlike any other, full of a strange power and realism, and touched with a fine humor."—London World.

"One of the most remarkable and powerful of the year's contributions, worthy to stand with Ian Maclaren's."—British Weekly.

"One of the rare books which can be read with great pleasure and recommended without reservation. It is fresh, pure, sweet, and pathetic, with a pathos which is perfectly wholesome."—St. Paul Globe.

"The story is an intensely human one, and it is delightfully told. . . . The author shows a marvelous keenness in character analysis, and a marked ingenuity in the development of her story."—Boston Advertiser.

INTO THE HIGHWAYS AND HEDGES.
12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"A touch of idealism, of nobility of thought and purpose, mingled with an air of reality and well-chosen expression, are the most notable features of a book that has not the ordinary defects of such qualities. With all its elevation of utterance and spirituality of outlook and insight it is wonderfully free from overstrained or exaggerated matter, and it has glimpses of humor. Most of the characters are vivid, yet there are restraint and sobriety in their treatment, and almost all are carefully and consistently evolved."—London Athenæum.

"'Into the Highways and Hedges' is a book not of promise only, but of high achievement. It is original, powerful, artistic, humorous. It places the author at a bound in the rank of those artists to whom we look for the skillful presentation of strong personal impressions of life and character."—London Daily News.

"The pure idealism of 'Into the Highways and Hedges' does much to redeem modern fiction from the reproach it has brought upon itself. . . . The story is original, and told with great refinement."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"A better book than 'The Prisoner of Zenda.'"—London Queen.

THE CHRONICLES OF COUNT ANTONIO.

By ANTHONY HOPE, author of "The God in the Car," "The Prisoner of Zenda," etc. With photogravure Frontispiece by S. W. Van Schaick. Third edition. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"No adventures were ever better worth recounting than are those of Antonio of Monte Velluto, a very Bayard among outlaws. . . . To all those whose pulses still stir at the recital of deeds of high courage, we may recommend this book. . . . The chronicle conveys the emotion of heroic adventure, and is picturesquely written."—London Daily News.

"It has literary merits all its own, of a deliberate and rather deep order. . . . In point of execution 'The Chronicles of Count Antonio' is the best work that Mr. Hope has yet done. The design is clearer, the workmanship more elaborate, the style more colored. . . . The incidents are most ingenious, they are told quietly, but with great cunning, and the Quixotic sentiment which pervades it all is exceedingly pleasant."—Westminster Gazette.

"A romance worthy of all the expectations raised by the brilliancy of his former books, and likely to be read with a keen enjoyment and a healthy exaltation of the spirits by every one who takes it up."—The Scotsman.

"A gallant tale, written with unflinching freshness and spirit."—London Daily Telegraph.

"One of the most fascinating romances written in English within many days. The quaint simplicity of its style is delightful, and the adventures recorded in these 'Chronicles of Count Antonio' are as stirring and ingenious as any conceived even by Weyman at his best."—New York World.

"Romance of the real flavor, wholly and entirely romance, and narrated in true romantic style. The characters, drawn with such masterly handling, are not merely pictures and portraits, but statues that are alive and step boldly forward from the canvas."—Boston Courier.

"Told in a wonderfully simple and direct style, and with the magic touch of a man who has the genius of narrative, making the varied incidents flow naturally and rapidly in a stream of sparkling discourse."—Detroit Tribune.

"Easily ranks with, if not above, 'A Prisoner of Zenda.' . . . Wonderfully strong, graphic, and compels the interest of the most blasé novel reader."—Boston Advertiser.

"No adventures were ever better worth telling than those of Count Antonio. . . . The author knows full well how to make every pulse thrill, and how to hold his readers under the spell of his magic."—Boston Herald.

"A book to make women weep proud tears, and the blood of men to tingle with knightly fervor. . . . In 'Count Antonio' we think Mr. Hope surpasses himself, as he has already surpassed all the other story-tellers of the period."—New York Spirit of the Times.

NOVELS BY HALL CAINE.

THE MANXMAN. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"A story of marvelous dramatic intensity, and in its ethical meaning has a force comparable only to Hawthorne's 'Scarlet Letter.'"—Boston Beacon.

"A work of power which is another stone added to the foundation of enduring fame to which Mr. Caine is yearly adding."—Public Opinion.

"A wonderfully strong study of character; a powerful analysis of those elements which go to make up the strength and weakness of a man, which are at fierce warfare within the same breast; contending against each other, as it were, the one to raise him to fame and power, the other to drag him down to degradation and shame. Never in the whole range of literature have we seen the struggle between these forces for supremacy over the man more powerfully, more realistically delineated than Mr. Caine pictures it."—Boston Home Journal.

THE DEEMSTER. A Romance of the Isle of Man. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"Hall Caine has already given us some very strong and fine work, and 'The Deemster' is a story of unusual power. . . . Certain passages and chapters have an intensely dramatic grasp, and hold the fascinated reader with a force rarely excited nowadays in literature."—The Critic.

"One of the strongest novels which has appeared in many a day."—San Francisco Chronicle.

"Fascinates the mind like the gathering and bursting of a storm."—Illustrated London News.

"Deserves to be ranked among the remarkable novels of the day."—Chicago Times.

THE BONDMAN. New edition. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"The welcome given to this story has cheered and touched me, but I am conscious that, to win a reception so warm, such a book must have had readers who brought to it as much as they took away. . . . I have called my story a saga, merely because it follows the epic method, and I must not claim for it at any point the weighty responsibility of history, or serious obligations to the world of fact. But it matters not to me what Icelanders may call 'The Bondman,' if they will honor me by reading it in the open hearted spirit and with the free mind with which they are content to read of Grettir and of his fights with the Troll."—From the Author's Preface.

CAPT'N DAVY'S HONEYMOON. A Manx Yarn. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"A new departure by this author. Unlike his previous works, this little tale is almost wholly humorous, with, however, a current of pathos underneath. It is not always that an author can succeed equally well in tragedy and in comedy, but it looks as though Mr. Hall Caine would be one of the exceptions."—London Literary World.

"It is pleasant to meet the author of 'The Deemster' in a brightly humorous little story like this. . . . It shows the same observation of Manx character, and much of the same artistic skill."—Philadelphia Times.

NOVELS BY MAARTEN MAARTENS.

THE GREATER GLORY. A Story of High Life.

By MAARTEN MAARTENS, author of "God's Fool," "Joost Avelingh," etc. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"Until the Appletons discovered the merits of Maarten Maartens, the foremost of Dutch novelists, it is doubtful if many American readers knew that there were Dutch novelists. His 'God's Fool' and 'Joost Avelingh' made for him an American reputation. To our mind this just published work of his is his best. . . . He is a master of epigram, an artist in description, a prophet in insight,"—Boston Advertiser.

"It would take several columns to give any adequate idea of the superb way in which the Dutch novelist has developed his theme and wrought out one of the most impressive stories of the period. . . . It belongs to the small class of novels which one can not afford to neglect."—San Francisco Chronicle.

"Maarten Maartens stands head and shoulders above the average novelist of the day in intellectual subtlety and imaginative power."—Boston Beacon.

GOD'S FOOL. By MAARTEN MAARTENS. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"Throughout there is an epigrammatic force which would make palatable a less interesting story of human lives or one less deftly told."—London Saturday Review.

"Perfectly easy, graceful, humorous. . . . The author's skill in character-drawing is undeniable."—London Chronicle.

"A remarkable work."—New York Times.

"Maarten Maartens has secured a firm footing in the eddies of current literature. . . . Pathos deepens into tragedy in the thrilling story of 'God's Fool.'"—Philadelphia Ledger.

"Its preface alone stamps the author as one of the leading English novelists of to-day."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"The story is wonderfully brilliant. . . . The interest never lags; the style is realistic and intense; and there is a constantly underlying current of subtle humor. . . . It is, in short, a book which no student of modern literature should fail to read."—Boston Times.

"A story of remarkable interest and point."—New York Observer.

JOOST AVELINGH. By MAARTEN MAARTENS. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"So unmistakably good as to induce the hope that an acquaintance with the Dutch literature of fiction may soon become more general among us."—London Morning Post.

"In scarcely any of the sensational novels of the day will the reader find more nature or more human nature."—London Standard.

"A novel of a very high type. At once strongly realistic and powerfully idealistic."—London Literary World.

"Full of local color and rich in quaint phraseology and suggestion."—London Telegraph.

"Maarten Maartens is a capital story-teller."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Our English writers of fiction will have to look to their laurels."—Birmingham Daily Post.

Edited by Ripley Hitchcock.

"There is a vast extent of territory lying between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast which has barely been skimmed over so far. That the conditions of life therein are undergoing changes little short of marvelous will be understood when one recalls the fact that the first white male child born in Kansas is still living there; and Kansas is by no means one of the newer States. Revolutionary indeed has been the upturning of the old condition of affairs, and little remains thereof, and less will remain as each year goes by, until presently there will be only tradition of the Sioux and Comanches, the cowboy life, the wild horse, and the antelope. Histories, many of them, have been written about the Western country alluded to, but most if not practically all by outsiders who knew not personally that life of kaleidoscopic allurements. But ere it shall have vanished forever we are likely to have truthful, complete, and charming portrayals of it produced by men who actually knew the life and have the power to describe it."—Henry Edward Rood, in the Mail and Express.

NOW READY.

THE STORY OF THE INDIAN. By GEORGE BIRD GRINNELL, author of "Pawnee Hero Stories," "Blackfoot Lodge Tales," etc. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"In every way worthy of an author who, as an authority upon the Western Indians, is second to none. A book full of color, abounding in observation, and remarkable in sustained interest, it is at the same time characterized by a grace of style which is rarely to be looked for in such a work, and which adds not a little to the charm of it."—London Daily Chronicle.

"Only an author qualified by personal experience could offer us a profitable study of a race so alien from our own as is the Indian in thought, feeling, and culture. Only long association with Indians can enable a white man measurably to comprehend their thoughts and enter into their feelings. Such association has been Mr. Grinnell's."—New York Sun.

THE STORY OF THE MINE. By CHARLES HOWARD SHINN. Illustrated. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

The figures of the prospector and the miner are clearly outlined in the course of the romantic story of that mine which more than any other embodies the romance, the vicissitudes, the triumphs, the excitement, and the science of mining life—the Great Comstock Lode. From the prospector, through development and deep-mining, to the last of the stock gambling, the story is told in a way that presents a singularly vivid and engrossing picture of a life which has played so large a part in the development of the remoter West.

THE BEGINNERS OF A NATION. A History of the Source and Rise of the Earliest English Settlements in America, with Special Reference to the Life and Character of the People. The first volume in A History of Life in the United States. By EDWARD EGGLESTON. Small 8vo. Cloth, gilt top, uncut, with Maps, $1.50.

It is nearly seventeen years since the studies for this book were begun. In January, 1880, having decided to write a History of Life in the United States, Mr. Eggleston employed himself during convalescence in seeking books bearing on the subject on all the quays of Paris. From that beginning has grown the large and valuable collection of many thousand books relating to American history, and to social, industrial, and intellectual life generally in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, which fill the walls of a stone library building on Lake George. Mr. Eggleston has produced, in the years since that beginning was made, two novels and several school-books on American history, now widely used; but eleven of the last seventeen years have been wholly given up to investigations and studies which find their first permanent result in the present volume. Thirteen articles on Colonial Life were contributed to the Century Magazine by the author between 1882 and 1889. They were recognized at once as authority on the subject, were quoted in learned works, were discussed by at least one scholar in a German periodical, were placed in class libraries in leading institutions of learning, and were cited by a well-known professor as "the only authority on colonial life to be depended on." Mr. Eggleston was importuned to gather them into a book, but his project had grown with his knowledge of the subject, and he has given himself of late years to produce on an entirely new plan the first of a series of volumes, each to be complete in itself, which as a whole shall represent the life of the people of the United States in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In order to do this, it has been necessary not only to prosecute studies in most of the great public libraries of this country, but also to make repeated sojourns in Europe for the purpose of investigations in the British Museum and the State Paper Department of the Record Office, and the French National Library. Mr. Eggleston gained access also to papers not before used in private repositories in England and America. To get local color and additional information, he has visited all of the original thirteen colonies. The first installment of this historical series is thus the ripe fruit of many years of tireless investigation. The book has been wrought out and thought out thoroughly, and the initial stage of United States history is presented here in a light strangely different from that to which readers of history have been accustomed.

UNCLE REMUS. His Songs and his Sayings. By JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS. With new Preface and Revisions, and 112 Illustrations by A. B. Frost. Library Edition. 12mo. Buckram, gilt top, uncut, $2.00. Also, Edition de luxe of the above, limited to 250 copies, each signed by the author, with the full-page cuts mounted on India paper. 8vo. White vellum, gilt top, $10.00.

"The old tales of the plantation have never been told as Mr. Harris has told them. Each narrative is to the point, and so swift in its action upon the risibilities of the reader that one almost loses consciousness of the printed page, and fancies it is the voice of the lovable old darky himself that steals across the senses and brings mirth inextinguishable as it comes; . . . and Mr. Frost's drawings are so superlatively good, so inexpressibly funny, that they promise to make this the standard edition of a standard book."—New York Tribune.

"An exquisite volume, full of good illustrations, and if there is anybody in this country who doesn't know Mr. Harris, here is an opportunity to make his acquaintance and have many a good laugh."—New York Herald.

"There is but one 'Uncle Remus,' and he will never grow old. . . . It was a happy thought, that of marrying the work of Harris and Frost."—New York Mail and Express.

"Nobody could possibly have done this work better than Mr. Frost, whose appreciation of negro life fitted him especially to be the interpreter of 'Uncle Remus,' and whose sense of the humor in animal life makes these drawings really illustrations in the fullest sense. Mr. Harris's well-known work has become in a sense a classic, and this may be accepted as the standard edition."—Philadelphia Times.

"A book which became a classic almost as soon as it was published. . . . Mr. Frost has never done anything better in the way of illustration, if indeed he has done anything as good."—Boston Advertiser.

"We pity the reader who has not yet made the acquaintance of 'Uncle Remus' and his charming story. . . . Mr. Harris has made a real addition to literature purely and strikingly American, and Mr. Frost has aided in fixing the work indelibly on the consciousness of the American reader."—The Churchman.

"The old fancies of the old negro, dear as they may have been to us these many years, seem to gain new life when they appear through the medium of Mr. Frost's imagination."—New York Home Journal.

"In his own peculiar field 'Uncle Remus' has no rival. The book has become a classic, but the latest edition is the choice one. It is rarely given to an author to see his work accompanied by pictures so closely in sympathy with his text."—San Francisco Argonaut.

"We say it with the utmost faith that there is not an artist who works in illustration that can catch the attitude and expression, the slyness, the innate depravity, the eye of surprise, obstinacy, the hang of the head or the kick of the heels of the mute and the brute creation as Mr. Frost has shown to us here."—Baltimore Sun.
